TO MY HEART. BY JULIA A. SHERMAN.

Hush, heart! It is but for a little while, The joy, or sorrow, tear or smile, Although it seem not so. Each hour is bearing thee away, Life is but one brief yesterday,

Be it of joy, or woe.

Beat patiently thy measured round, Steady and even be thy sound; Gird thee with strength my will ! How many hearts have throbbed like thine With yearning human and divine,

Yet now lie cold and still! Dost thou, O weak, besotted thing, Dream aught below can rapture bring

Or satisfy desire ? Nay, added coals but feed the flame, Which burning, craveth still the same, And riseth ever higher.

Peace heart ! One only resting place is thine,

One only pure and perfect shrine, Where thou may'st safely hide: There joy and peace unchanging dwell, Heart thou hast proved it oft and well, There steadfastly abide!

Miscellaneons.

"LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION." Two boys, both about fifteen years of age, were cities.

Walter Hyde was the son of an invalid widow, and his earnings were her only means of support. Andrew Strong was the eldest son of a poor mechanic, who had quite a large family depending upon him for their daily bread. Both the boys were capable and industrious; both were equally well disposed, and both were members of the "Temperance Union," which had been started in their Sabbath-school. They had but lately entered upon the business in which they were now engaged, and which promised to be a lucrative occupation. Walter and Andrew were good friends, and glad o a situation where they could labor together. But they had not long been employed in the he grocery before they learned to their dismay that Mr. Bates, its proprietor, kept a bar in the store where he retailed alcoholic drinks. The two boys conferred together upon the proprieto the noble face of his companion, and after a long ty of remaining at a place where stimulants were sold. They had nothing to do with the sale of the liquor, and did not know whether to remain would interfere with their pledge or not.

'Let us talk with our folks at home,' said Walter 'They will know best. I shall do just as my mother 'And I will ask my father and mother,' said Andrew, 'I don't know whether they will think it a sufficient reason for me to leave, but I know they will hate me to lose my situation.'

'Mother,' said Walter Hyde, seating himself beside her easy chair, and leaning his head on his mother's shoulder 'did you know Mr. Bates sold liquor ?' Why no, my son,' said Mrs. Hyde with a startled movement. 'Does he?'

'Yes. I didn't know it for a fact until to-day, and a blessing to society. though I have mistrusted it before. What do you think about my staying there?

'I don't have anything to do with the liquor department, but it don't seem exactly right to stay where it is sold. Does it to you, mother?'

For a moment the mother did not answer. Poverty is a hard thing to battle with, and Mrs. Hyde knew only too well what must follow the loss of her son's

But as she pondered, there came to her mind from the dim recollections of the past the memory of a boy she had known in girlhood. A brave, high-spirited lad, with the promise of as noble a manhood as lay before her own cherished boy. But how little a thing had wrecked the hopes of his friends, and brought him to a drunkard's grave. It was at first the companionship of those who loved strong drink.

'Lead us not into temptation.' When could these words be more fitly uttered than now? 'My dear boy, let us pray together,' said this Christian mother. And together they knelt in the cheerful firelight, and the Lord's prayer was breathed from the lips of Mrs. Hyde.

'I can answer you now, Walter. I would rather starve than have you for a single day exposed to such temptations as beset a drinking-house. You may tell Mr. Bates in the morning that you cannot work for him any longer. The bitterest poverty, even starvation, would be preferable to having my boy in danger of becoming a drunkard.'

In his home that evening, Andrew Strong asked the same question of his parents that Walter had asked of his mother.

'You say you don't have any thing to do with the liquor, eh?' questioned Mr. Strong.

'No sir, but I am right where it is all the time. I can't help that, if I stay there.'

'If we were able to get along without your wages, I would'nt have you remain another day; but I have so many mouths to feed, and our rent is coming due, and if you leave there you may not get another situation in a long time. What do you think, Anna;' he inquired of his wife, 'had the boy better

Mrs. Strong was one of the Marthas; troubled about many things.

She keenly felt their necessities, and the more limited their circumstances, the more care and burden fell upon her shoulders. It seemed to the poor weary woman as almost unbearable. She suggested a com,

'Let him stay a little while,' said she, ' until we can get the rent paid, and meanwhile be looking up a new situation for him. We wont have him remain any longer than is really necessary.'

The next day Walter Hyde resigned his situation and he and his widowed mother were left without the means of support. But they put their trust in God, and He did not forsake them. You have heard the proverb, 'Heaven helps those who help themselves. Never was a truer saying.

Walter when he found himself out of employment, did not sit down and fold his hands in discouragement, but he went about looking for something to do ready meanwhile to take any honest occupation that offered itself. He picked up little jobs here and there performing them well and faithfully, until at last a gentleman struck by his frank, manly countenance, and learning something of his history, interested himself in the boys behalf, and procured him a clerkship in a large manufacturing establishment, a far better position pecuniarily than the one he had occupied before.

Andrew Strong remained in the store of Mr. Bates. 'It was only for a little while,' said his father and mother. They intended to find him another situation as soon as possible. His father made inquiries to that effect whenever he thought it advisable, but nothing satisfactory turned up, and so Andrew still

At first no apparent evils resulted from his stay, and as familiarity with a danger causes it to seem less dangerous, they finally ceased to feel troubled regarding the temptations that surrounded him. For a long time Audrew remembered his pledge, and was careful to avoid the liquor department of the grocery. But as day after day passed by, and he grew accustomed to the sight and smell of liquor, and became familiar with the men who frequented the bar room, he would occasionally be persuaded to taste of the intoxicating drink. He no longer frequented the meetings of the 'Temperance Union,' for the first time he broke his pledge he feit that he no longer had a right to be there. He did not have the courage and resolution to confess his wrong-doing and promise amendment for the future.

Twenty years passed by. In one of our large manufacturing towns, as the wealthy owner of nearly half the mills in the place was walking along the street one day, he saw a man lying drunk by the roadside. He stopped to see if he could not do something for the poor fellow, for he was a kindhearted man, ever ready to relieve suffering humanity.

'Do you know this man?' he inquired of a passer by. It chanced to be the superintendent of one of the factories that he addressed.

'No. He is a stranger in the place. He came to me yesterday morning to hire out in the mill. I hired him, and then he told me he had been out of work so long that he had been unable to get anything to eat, and that he wanted pay for yesterday's work in order to get him something. I paid him, and he spent it for liquor it seems.' 'What did he tell you his name was,' inquired the factory owner. 'Andrew Strong,' was the answer. 'Is it possible!' The wealthy gentleman looked ong and earnestly at the features of the poor inebriate, then said, 'Yes, it must be he.' Then turning to the man he had been talking employed as clerks in a large grocery, in one of our with, he said, 'Mr. Heaton if you will help me carry this man to my house, I will do you a good turn Mr. Heaton looked surprised, but did as his employer requested. When Andrew Strong awoke from his drunken slumber he found himself in a rich and costly apartment, and surrounded by all the appurtenances of wealth: and beside him sat a strange gentleman whom he never recollected of seeing before.

Where am I? What does this mean?' he demanded as his scattered senses returned to him. What am I here for?' 'Andrew Strong,' said the stranger 'do you renember me?" 'No, I never saw you before,' was the answer. 'You are mistaken, then; for you and I were once friends. Don't you remember Walter Hyde who used to work with you in the store of Mr. Bates?'

'But I am; the same the little boy who talked with you about the expediency of leaving the store because they sold liquor. The poor inebriate looked with his bleared eyes in

'Then I suppose you are the Hyde that owns all these factories, and is so rich.'

A pause, and then came a groan from the poor drunkard, so deep and heart-broken that the rich factory owner never forgot it to his dying day.

O that my father and mother had laid me in my grave,' said he, 'rather than have left me remain in hat soul-destroying liquor house. Just there is when I went down and you went up. If I had left the place when you did, I might now be an honored and respected man like you. My parents are more to blame for my present situation than I am.' 'My poor friend do not despair,' said Walter Hyde.

'It is not yet too late for you to reform, I will help you, and I am sure there is manhood enough left in your soul to bring you up again.' And he did help him. And the poor wretched inebriate became again a man, respected by his fellows

Parents do you know what you are doing, when you carelessly permit your children to associate with the winebibber and the drunkard, when you allow their tender minds to become accustomed to scenes of dissipation, to look upon the wine when it is red and become fascinated with its glittering sparkle? See to it that ye forget not the petition our Father taught us: 'Lead us not into temptation.'-Progress

LINES ON THE DEATH OF A MOTHER. (Published by request.)

Our mother dear has passed away-Her spirit winged its flight, We hope to meet her soon again In endless realms of light; She passed through many a winter's blast, And many a summer's sun.

The Lord has called her home at last-Her mortal race is run.

We gathered round her bed of death, But one was missing there, She'd often wished and often prayed To see that one again; And tears would often fill her eyes When of that one she thought,

And joy would fill her troubled heart, When news from her was brought. While laid upon her bed of pain, Her body sick and sore, She thought of them so far away,

On earth to see no more; The day was drawing to its close When she gently closed her eyes, When Jesus sent an angel down To bear her to the skies.

That angel came, with silent tread, And beckoned her to come, And gently took her by the hand, To lead her spirit home;

In that bright home of peace alone, We hope she's happy now, We hope a harp is in her hand, A crown upon her brow.

We mourn our loss, but still we know Our father's will is best, He called her from this world of care, To her eternal rest; Let us prepare to follow her,

Then when the Lord may come, We may be ready at His call, To enter heaven our home.

Those ones of whom she thought so much, Are in a far off land-

They could not hear the parting word, Nor press the clay cold hand; Weep not, dear ones, though she has gone, And you no more have met, Though worlds may fade, and time may You'll meet your sister yet.

For there is a glorious world above, And there we hope to meet, Where children meet their parents dear, And friends each other greet; No separation there will come, Nor ruthless death decay,

But God will lead us to His throne, And wipe all tears away. There in that glorious world above We shall our Saviour see, And praise His holy name

To all eternity. Then let us hasten to the day Which shall our flesh restore, When death shall be done away, And we shall part no more.
