A PASSIONATE TEMPER. AND HOW IT WAS CURED.

It was a question often asked in the Woodbridge family: "Where does Harry get his temper?" Uncles, aunts and cousins wondered over it: not from papa, certainly, for who could be kinder or more patient than Uncle Woodbridge? and Aunt Mary, every one knew, was gentleness. Aunt Bessie, who was still a young lady at school, remarked that she had read that children resembled their grandparents oftener than their parents; but at this dear Grandmamma Woodbridge shook her head and "I am sure it was not your father's temper, Bessie; but, maybe-I don't know, I have been hasty

"O! mamma," was all that Bessie said; but it was quite plain that no one thought Harry's temper at all like grandmamma's.

Little Harry Woodbridge, whose hasty disposion was so often a subject of remark, was a brigh boy of eleven, very much like other boys, with some faults and some good qualities. He was generous and kind-hearted, quick to sympathize with others, and very truthful; most people trusted Harry, even those who knew little of him, for honesty seemed written on his face. Now, you may think that Harry bears a very good character, but, as I said before, he had some faults, and the worst was a passionate temper.

When he was quite a little fellow, his mother was very ill; not for a few days or weeks, but for more than a year. Into her still, darkened chamber the child was brought once a day, and told to step on tip-toe to his mother's lounge and speak softly; but after she had kissed him and talked with him a little in her low, weak voice, they took him away, and for the rest of the day Harry was left to the servants, who gave him his own way in everything, never contradicting him, and hastening to gratify every whim. I think it was this indulgence that gave rise to Harry's great fault. If the most beautiful flower garden be neglected weeds will spring up here and there, and we know not whence they come; little seeds blown by the winds nurtured by the showers that fall alike on everything, unfolding, at first, tender, delicate leaves, soon growing into rank noisome shrubs. So in the garden of the heart; if good thoughts and gentle affections, that spring from love to God and man, be not planted and carefully watched and tended, such weeds as envy and pride and passion will spring up and overshadow all that is good. Mr. Woodbridge often talked with his son of the folly and evil of giving way to passion. He pictured its dangers, and dwelt long on the remorse that must have filled the heart of Cain after the moment of ungoverned rage that made him a murderer; and Harry would listen and think that he would try to overcome himself, until the temptation came; and then he knew nothing more till the fit of anger was over, and he met the sad eyes of his mother looking at him so reproachfully, yet so lovingly, that there was no need of the sigh with which she turned away, to touch Harry to the heart. It made him wretched; yet, miserable as he was, he could not help feeling that he was more watchful of himself while the memory of his mother's look remained

Mr. Elder, Harry's teacher at school, took great interest in his pupils, both in school, and out, and Harry's failing did not escape his notice.

One rainy Saturday, when Harry was the first at school, he began by asking.

"What is the matter with your eye Woodbridge?" Harry's eye had been black for some days, and he could not help thinking it a little strange that Mr. Elder had just noticed it. He looked rather foolish as he replied.

"I struck William Jones, sir, and he struck me ly nine—I've a remedy to propose to you; stop a few minutes after school." Harry waited, and was very much surprised to hear Mr. Elder say. "When you feel yourself getting angry, deliberately close your lips and count twenty. Try this a dozen times, and you will find it becoming a habit." It was some days after this conversation that Harry was sitting in the porch busy with his grammar lesson; little Mary came singing through the hall, and he called to her. "Mary, did you feed my bird this morning?" "Oh! I forgot, I'll go this minute."

"No," cried Harry, "don't do it. You left poor Dicky all day without anything to eat or drink, and now I'll feed him myself."

But Mary was out of hearing, and had already taken down the cage when he came up.

"Let it alone, Mary." "Oh! brother," said the little girl, with the tears standing in her eyes, "I didn't mean to; mother said Jake might go with us for a walk, and

"Shut the door," cried Harry, angrily; but it was too late. Mary had been holding the door open, as she stood pleading for forgiveness, and Dicky, with his little head on one side, looked into the open air, at the oak tree and the honey-suckles, and Watches, Jewelry, Silver and Plated Ware. spreading his wings, was a free-bird once more. Harry rushed to the table, and snatching the cage from his sister, pushed her roughly away; the child fell, and a heavy beam that stood leaning against the table, jarred by Harry's shaking, came down on her arm. Mary gave one scream and turned very white, while Harry, sobered in a moment, sprang forward and raised the beam-it took most of his JET and VULCANITE GOODS, ELECTRO-PLATED strength—and bent over her with a face as pale as

"Sissy, Sissy, did it hurt you much? Oh! do speak. I've killed her !" cried the terrified boy,

Mrs. Woodbridge came running from the house, and heard Harry's last words. She bent over the child to see where she was hurt, and passed her

"Mamma, brother didn't mean to do it." Harry thought that this would break his heart, "Run for Doctor Brown," said his mother; and

Harry ran as fast as he could. It was not very long before Mary was able to be up with her arm in a sling; but the days seemed weeks to the boy. His whole time, out of school was given up to amuse his little sister; he read to her and played with her very gently and patiently; and when the poor child said once: "Brother, I'm so sorry about Dicky," he declared that he did'nt

Mrs. Woodbridge had never spoken to Harry of the accident since the doctor asked how it happened, although she seemed much troubled.

One evening he was again in the porch, building block house for Mary. Old Ponto was near and stretched at full length in the sunshine, seemingly isleep, although his eyes were half open. It was nly seeming, for as two or three chickens flew ver the fence, he roused himself with a growl and oceeded to drive off the intruders. His great, ishy tail swept the steeple of Harry's house to the ound and broke down one side of the building, ad Harry struck him with his bat a blow that sent im howling out of the porch. His mother looked t him sorrowfully for a moment, then her gaze vandered to Mary's bandaged arm, and from that U June 10 o her forehead; and she rose and went away. That silent look made Harry very uncomfortable thinking and could not sleep.

There was the glimmer of a light along the hall, nd his mother came in and sat down on the side f his bed.

and he put his arms round her neck and whispered, "Mother, it shall be a lesson. I'll try." They talked until it was quite late, and Harry told his mother how he had felt all the time, how he thought, when Mary was sick, that he could never get in a passion again. This churn has two Dashers, each revolving in an opposite direction. It is useless to attempt a description of this churn in an advertisement, it has to be seen to be appreciated.
