and a state of a second state and the second state of the second s

In the way of practical poetry, there are not many stanzas that convey a more direct lesson than the following, which gives instruction "how to replenish the Church treasury." Every young lady and gentleman of any age can adapt its idea to their | at a time. peculiar habits :

Let Annie buy one ribbon less, And Fanny give one ring; Grace sacrifice one change of dress, One sash and fancy string.

Let Julia from her next new suit One lace-trimmed ruffle spare; The time required on such to flute Let it be spent in prayer. [Blessing invaluable.]

Let Mesdames A, B, C and D, Their households watch with care; Each save from waste (theft ?) one ounce of tea, One needless luxury spare (50 cents per week x 2 00 4-1]

Let Kate and Rose each take her turn, With their wise ma's consent, Each for one week three dollars earn (As Bridget left in Lent).

Let Mary once with Jane forego Their pleasant carriage-drive [5 saved]. And help dear sister Abbie sew [earned $5]. Thus save and double five. 10 00

Let Susie save her furs with care To serve next winter's cold, And guard her dress from stain and tear, That she may give her gold.

Let Lizzie stop and think again, Ere she concludes to buy, 'This diamond's cost might save lost men! I'll give its price-and try."

HOW MAY'S PRAYER WAS ANSWERED. BY RUTHELLA SCHULTZ.

"Now I lay me down to sleep," began little May Bridgeman, kneeling on the bare floor beside her bed, two chubby hands covering her face, and two tiny, dimpled feet, at other times so restless, lying quietly on the cold boards; for May had been taught that she must behave very reverently when always shone like clearest crystal. Then the care of her flowers took much of May's time. When her mother went out in search of work, leaving her alone, the little girl went at once to her task, and standing on tip-toe, polished the window panes till they shone like diamonds. Then she carried some clear, cold water in the milk-pitcher and carefully watered her flowers, giving each a little

Among them was a beautiful, half-open rose, as white as the snow when it first falls from the sky. $4 00 Near by stood a large rose-geranium, with its fra-5 00 50 00 grant dark green leaves. May looked first at one then at the other. She remembered having seen a 3 00 little girl-only a little bigger than herself-sitting at a street corner selling flowers. A gentle-3 00 man had bought a bunch and put it in his buttonhole, and the little girl had put the money in her pocket. And that bunch of flowers was a white rose with geranium-leaves all around it.

May stood looking at her treasures, her tiny mouth wide open, and her blue eyes growing bigger and bigger. It was like cutting off one of her own golden curls to cut her white rose from its stem. But her mamma wanted money ; and tying on her little hood, May took the scissors from her mother's work-box and cut off her white rose and four large geranium leaves. Of course she cut the stems so short that she could hardly hold them with her little fat hands; and of course she did'nt know enough to tie them together with a bit of thread. Grasping the white rose and four green leaves in one hand, she clung to the banisters with the other, and soon made her way down the long, long stairs, and into the street. Then she hurried on, straight on, till she came to Broadway. Standing there in the busy crowd, bewildered with the noise, and frightened to find herself alone among such a multitude of people, she looked across the street, and there on the opposite corner stood a little girl with 500 00 flowers for sale ! May was sure this was the very little girl whom she had seen selling flowers, and thought she must go right over there and stand beside her. So she started across. Carriages, carts, stages, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds were rush > ing up and down that narrow way which is so unjustly called Broad. But May was not afraid. She thought of nothing but her flowers, and the money they would bring, and how glad her mamma would

She had gone about a dozen steps of the way, her tiny feet buried in the mud, and her eyes fixed on the white rose and green leaves in her hand, when suddenly a policeman's whistle sounded sharp and withstanding so large a sum has been put by in reserve, , and several men shouted aloud, and there instant little May was thrown down under the horses' feet, and the next she was snatched up and just in time to save her life. A crowd gathered around him as soon as he reached the sidewalk with the little girl in his arms. Everybody began talking at once. " If you'll all hold on a minute, I'll question her," said the man, looking pitifully at the frightened, weeping child. "Perhaps she can tell something about herself. What's your name, my little girl ?' May answered between her sobs-telling not only her name, but where she lived, and why she was out alone, and all about it. The tall, strong man, keeping her in his arms, quietly told those around him that he would take her home, and started off with her, followed by a number of half-grown boys, who one by one dropped off after a little, leaving him to pursue his way alone. It was not long before he stood at the street door of the house where May lived. Then he perched her on his shoulder, and went up the long flights of stairs without stopping till he came to the door of May's home He put her down, and she opened the door. Mrs. Bridgeman had not yet come home, so the kind man who had saved May's life seated himself by the table to wait for her, and began to look over the family Bible, a tear now and then falling from his eyes upon the pages; and May stood in the corner watching him, with her finger in her mouth till she heard her mother's step upon the stair, and then she ran and opened the door. But Mrs. Bridgeman did not come in, She only stood there, her hand on the door-knob, and looked as if frightened at the stranger, until he rose and stretching out his arms towards her; speaking to her Father in heaven, who was now her only Father. At the end of this little prayer, she had been instructed to ask heaven's blessing upon her friends, and the forgiveness of her sins. But May was only three years old, and not knowing the meaning of that sad word, sins, she always called it "sense." Her mother had never corrected her mistake, or told her the meaning of sin, for she often thought, with a sigh, that her little girl would learn it all soon. But on the evening of which I am telling you, little May prayed :

" O Lord ! bless my dear mamma and all my good friends, and my pretty flowers in the window ; and forgive me all my sense-all you can, all I can have! Amen."

And then she sprang into her mother's arms, a happy light beaming in her blue eyes; and, after many good night kisses, was snugly tucked in bed, and soon fell sound asleep.

Mrs. Bridgeman returned to her work with a heavy heart. She was a dress-cap maker. Dresscaps, I suppose you know, are those pretty caps worn by old ladies. There are many young girls and older women, too, who earn their living by making them. Sometimes there is plenty of this work, and good prices are paid. But at the time of which I am telling you, there was very little work to be had of any kind, for it was during the war. Besides being very poorly paid, Mrs. Bridgeman had but little to do. Still, she was thankful for any work, and was glad to fill up her spare time in making soldier's shirts for six cents apiece, and knapsacks for three cents. But matters were daily getting worse. Sometimes the man for whom she made dress-caps was not able to pay her, and she had to wait till he could get the money. She had now been waiting a long time, and might not be paid for weeks to come. The man who had given her the soldiers' shirts to make had gone away without paying her, and she knew not where to look for him. She had only one dollar left, and there was but little food in the cupboard-not enough to last two days longer. Then her month's rent would be due within a fortnight. To be sure it was not much that she paid for her one room, on the top-floor of a tenement-house-only four dollars a month; but where was she to get that much, and how were she and her little May to live, meantime?

The hours passed by, and Mrs. Bridgeman worked steadily on, a tear now and then falling on the lace and ribbon in her hands. She thought of her noble husband, who had died on a distant battle field. She thought of her girlhood's happy home, and of her parents now lying side by side in the country church-yard ; and then of her merry childhood, and of the brother who had shared it with her. Her brother! Oh ! if he were but living ! Would he not make her comfortable and happythat dear brother whom she had never seen since he left his father's house fourteen years before ? A light-hearted, brave, impulsive fellow of twenty-

" Mary, Mary! have I found you at last?"

And then May's mother threw her arms around his neck, and cried ;

"Willie! my brother! my brother!"

And then-but poor little May could hardly understand it-she was told that this strange man who had saved her life was her own uncle Willieher mother's long-lost brother. He had come home very rich, and had spent two years looking for his poor sister and her little daughter May.

All that day her uncle Willie stayed and talked with May's mamma, and the next day they went away from the little room in the top of the tenement-house, to live in a beautiful, beautiful home. And May did not forget to take her pet flowers with her, only they were transplanted into hand- GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, in all grades. some flower-pots.

And so May's prayer was answered ; for the Lord sent her rich uncle to make her and her dear mother comfortable and happy.

And May always had plenty of cents, to give to the poor little flower girls as she passed them in he street
