A HYMN OF FAITH.

God is,-but not to mortal eyes Is his mysterious presence shown; We know not where those mansions are, Not made by hands, around his throne.

This earth is but a vestibule Unto the inner temple, Heaven: Yet on its walls, and roof and floor, Are tokens of God's love engraven.

Two lamps stand ever burning bright For those who seek the temple door,-God's holy Book, his holier Son, To clear whate'er was dark before.

And they who love these heavenly lights Shall find the earth-home brighter far;

They add new beauty to a flower, They give new lustre to a star.

Sometimes a sorrow or a doubt, As chill winds flickering a torch, Rush o'er us, and we think the lights Have all gone out in God's great porch. Then, if in humble, patient prayer,

We bide the whirlwind passing by, E'en clouds of trouble will divide, And show the glory beaming nigh. A little while we walk and wait, We watch the opening of the door, Christ calls us and we enter in,-

God is,—we see him and adore. - Christian Register.

A STORY FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

THE MILLER'S DAUGHTER. On a high hill which rises above a little Silesian village, there stands a very large old castle. Nobody knows how long it has been there, and how many times it has changed its owners. At the time of which I am speaking, however, it was occupied by a baron and his wife and their only daughter, more. Liese the miller's daughter, whom she had together with enough servants to take care of such once despised, but who had now come to nurse her, an immense house. Down in the village, close by and to be her lifelong friend, read to her, talked the stream which passed through it, there stood a with her, walked with her, and proved a friend intime-worn mill. and though she was silent for a moment, they saw the tears stealing to her eyes-she had not forgotten the little Liese of former years. The baron promised to pay all the expenses that might be necessary for Liese to leave the factory, and arranged that she should spend several months, if need be, in his castle, nursing his daughter.

When the miller wrote to Liese, she was perfectly delighted that her proposals had been accepted, and never did the old stage-coach carry a happier heart than it did on the morning she left Chemnitz on her way home, and to Lili's bedside.

The meeting between the girls was pleasant, very pleasant, though Lili was very weak, and Liese could not have told who it was if she had seen her anywhere else. She attended faithfully at her bedside, slept in the same room with her was up at all hours of the night, and gave her medicine, and attended to every want. By and by Lili began to recover, but the doctor noticed one day that her eyes were very weak, and, after a few days, that they grew much worse. She could not bear the least light, and while her body was getting stronger all the time, her eyes were becoming weaker, and the doctor was very fearful that she might be blind. And so it was-Lili, the beautiful daughter of the baron became totally blind. As soon as she was strong enough to go out and walk about, she always needed somebody to take her by the hand; and who should do this but Liese ? She became very much attached to Liese again, as one might suppose; for nobody, not even her own mother, could take such care of her as the miller's daughter.

It was now out of all question for Liese to go back again to the factory in Chemnitz, and the baron made arrangements for her to become a permaanent member of his family, to take care of his Lili, and to be her constant attendant. One day Lili told Liese how she became very much ashamed of associating with poor people, and that therefore she had ceased to correspond with her. But now as soon as affliction had came upon her, she found that the friend of her early youth was a true friend indeed, and one who did not forget her. Year after year passed by, and yet poor Lili never recovered her sight.
