"Now, Lord, what wait I for ?"-PSALM XXXIX. 7. I am waiting for the answer To many an earnest prayer, Long have I watched and waited. And still will linger there. Thine hand, it is not shortened, Nor heavy is Thine ear, I know the answer's coming.

I am waiting for the moving Of the fiery piller bright, And I dare not take one footstep Without its guiding light. Thy Providence has led me In all my wandering past: That Providence will lead me, E'en to the very last.

And wait, and do not fear.

I am waiting for the triumph Of the right o'er sin and wrong, Which the "saints beneath the altar" Have waited for so long. Soon is that triumph coming, Soon shall the conflict cease, And war, and war's dark rumors, Shall end in lasting peace.

I am waiting till the darkness Shall all have cleared away. The night, it has been dreary: Bright, bright will be the day. "As they that watch for morning," Have I waited lone and long; And now I see the dawning, And my heart breaks forth in song.

I am waiting for the coming Of the glorious King of Kings; Who, in His march of conquest, Both joy and "healing" brings. O come, then, blessed Saviour, Thine is the right to reign; Desire of all the nations, O come to earth again.

I am waiting for the summons Of the Bridegroom drawing near, And I stand with loins well girded, And I watch till he appear. Soon shall I hear His voice: With such a blissful prospect I cannot but rejoice.

I am waiting for the opening Of the pearly, crystal gates, Of Jerusalem, the golden; For that my spirit waits, I long to hear the welcome-"Ye blessed, enter in ; Rest, weary ones, for ever From toil, and pain, and sin."

KATIE O'GRADY'S DOLL.

You all remember Katie O'Grady, the vagabond child, who used to run at large in the streets of Brookfield, and whose name was a by-word to express wild and uncivilized vagrancy.

Katie was one of those poor children to whom little is given, and of whom, consequently, little ought to be required; but somehow we never used to think much of that. When she stole our apples; beat poor precious Goatie over the head with a stick, as he stood caged and helpless on the postoffice steps; or when, as we passed the school-house, she shouted after us epithets more forcible than complimentary, we glowed with indignation, and wished she might have the good whipping or sound shaking she so richly deserved.

We did not often stop to think how many nights she had rnn crying into the darkness to escape the drunken fury of her brutal father, who used to beat her mother until the poor woman's screams aroused all the neighborhood: how many days she has been locked out of the only poor home she ever knew, and wandered about the streets, neglected and alone, or with her older brothers, even more wild and unruly than herself. We could scarcely make too much allowance for a poor child who never knew what it was to have a pleasant home, or a loving father or mother; and whose vague notions of right and wrong were derived from no higher standard than the public opinion of a district school.

The whole current of Katie's life was changed by an incident so simple, and its effect upon her was so remarkable, that I will tell you what I remember hearing at the time.

One summer evening, two young ladies, as they were walking through Water street, were attracted by the ingenuity and skill shown in the construction of Katie's play-houses. Truly palatial buildings they were, lining the street for some distance, and curiously furnished with every possibility of broken crockery and clam-shell. In the crowning glory of them all, the framework of an old tunnel bed, sat Katie, in a real little three legged chair, upon a piece of actual carpet, gravely reading a book. She looked up as they approached, and returned their salutation with unusual propriety, as if aware that the laws of hospitality had some claim upon her. As the young ladies passed on, the elder, Mary Fairfield, said to her sister :

"That little imp of mischief has a wonderful gift at furnishing a play-house. I wonder what she would think of a doll-a real, beautiful wax doll, such as ladies' little children have."

"Pearls before swine," briefly remarked the

"I don't care," returned Mary, "I'm going to get her a doll, just for fun, to see what she will say to it."

The younger sister continued her ridicule and remonstrance; but neither that nor her own secret conviction of her folly was able to drive the sudden fancy from Mary's mind; and a few evenings later she sought and found Katie in the same spot, and this time she bore a large white box. "Katie," said she, sitting down on the edge of an old trundle-bed, " everybody here tells me what a naughty little girl Katie O'Grady is. But, as I came by here the other night, and saw what nice playhouses she had made, I thought she deserved a dolly | 1 rich merchant. One day a letter came recalling to keep for your own. But here was one of those mysterious beings, | confidential clerk, with delicate, waxen skin, large, beautiful blue eyes, and lovely golden curls, dressed in blue silk, with some cloudy blue over-dress, trimmed and adorned like any lady's. All was complete, to the bright 5 and 7 Change Avenue, - blue slippers on the little feet. And this little lady was hers, to own and keep, lying affectionately in her lap. She took it right into her heart and worshipped it.

Quick as a bird, she covered the box, and tucked it away in a secret cave in the rocks; then flew to and hands; then, stealing into the house, she changed her dirty apron for a clean one, when she felt fit to handle her doll. She sat in her covert in the alder bushes, through the long summer twilight, carefully examining her treasure, and venturing now and then a shy caress: her undisciplined little heart full of new strange, vague thoughts and purposes. She was never to say naughty words, or could find it out, and she must take her up to Sunfrom father and mother; and Pat and Johnny; and she carefully prepared her cave in the rocks for dolly to live in. She remained till dark in an exalted fervor of goodness; when, having put dolly to bed, she ian off to the school-house, and had a STEAM ENGINE AND MACHINE SHOP, good time swearing and fighting with two or three other children, feeling that the little lady's observation would hardly extend as far as that,

But next morning, when she awoke, before sunrise, and jumped up and ran off at once, the rememberance of the evening's fray struck her with a sense of shame. Her face was badly scratched, her one clean apron torn; and she felt as if dolly would suspect what she had been about. However she made herself as presentable as she could, and purposes, of any size. Screw propellers; "Variable and was soon absorbed in her play.

In the midst of a long morning of happiness she was startled by the sound of the church-bell, bringing the rememberance that dolly must go to Sunday-school, or perhaps she would run away. A few hours later Mr. Ridley, the Sunday-school | PLOUGH. superintendent, coming out of church at the close of the morning service, found Katie O'Grady standing on the church steps, with an odd air of shy defiance, and a big wax doll under her arm.

"Don't you want to come to Sunday-school? said he pleasantly. "Yes, sir," she stammered. "Dolly wants to

This was the beginning of Katie's Sunday-school | mortality. Mutual Companies MAY not need to use this experience, which no threats from her parents could force her to relinquish, and without which even the powerful influence of her precious doll would have been insufficient to break the power of her evil habits. Here she learned for the first time about her heavenly Father and his great love for her, and was taught to look to him for help to lead the new life of goodness that she found so very

A short time afterwards Katie's mother died; and the event, which would have been to most hildren the greatest misfortune, was in the end a plessing to her. Her father became more intemperate and brutal than ever, and she was literally
