MY DYING DAY.

BY MISS NETTIE E. BADGER. My dying day-What shall it be? A day of sad regrets and fears? A day of penitential tears And dark uncertainty?

My dying day Why should I dread? If Christ for me has conquered death, I may await that day in faith, And welcome it instead.

My dying day-Oh may it be The happiest of all my life, The end of sin and care and strife, A day of victory! On that glad day

O may I see A shining group beyond the tide, Waiting upon the other side, With outstretched arms for me.

This reply seem to decide the boy. He drew his wooden stool to the side of the wall, and stepping upon it, reached to the hook above him, and took down a well-worn coat that had a home-made look I seem to touch upon some holy place about it. Then he tied an old fur cap closely about his ears, drew on a pair of clumsy mittins, and kissing Mina good by, stepped out into the dreary snow-this little one, in search of his missing mother. Little did their mother think, when she left her darlings early that morning, that she would not see them before night. That morning she started for the village with an article she had just finished. The snow lay deep on the ground and the storm was still raging, yet she must take this work to the shop that day, or else receive no pay.

he walked. His limbs were numb, and a dreadful weariness was slowly creeping upon him. After going a few rods further, he again stopped and "Mother, I'll come pretty soon; you won't care if I stop a moment to rest, for I'll come-I'll come." The last words were said very faintly, and he sank down into the white snow and fell asleep. God heard his prayer and gave "some warm." He rested, poor little weary one, not on the cold bed of snow, but in the loving arms of angels.

When the storm had ceased, the workmen, clearing the snow from the road, saw a small, dark object not far from them. On approaching, they found the body of faithful little Carl, half covered with the glistening snow, Tenderly they bore it to the house, and laid it on his little bed. Even those rough men could not refrain from tears when they saw the mother's grief and heard how bravely Carl had started out in search of her.

Mina and her mother still live in the old house, and whenever the wind roars down the chimney and the storm beats against the house, they think of that night which brought them such sorrow and their Carl such joy .- The Methodist.
