BABY'S STOCKING. BY J. W. BARKER.

'T will be Christmas to-morrow, dear mamma, And Santa will surely be here, With a sweep, like the skip of a fairy, And a step like the bound of a deer. He will call at our house, I am certain, As he glides in the starlight along, And scatters his toys for the children,

With laughter and snatches of song. So hang up the stockings dear mamma, Each one by its own little bed; Here's mine that is snowy and tattered, And Tommy's well mounted with red; And Susie's, the dear timid creature, She's ever so quiet and still; We'll hang them all up in the twilight, And leave them for Santa to fill.

But what shall we do with the baby's ? So tiny, it never could hold The half that old Santa might scatter,-This dear little lamb of the fold;

So tiny, I know he could miss it, The starlight would never reveal,-For, see, it is only a finger From the tip of the toe to the heel.

Besides, in his bluster and hurry, As he skims like a skiff o'er the sea, He would count only just the old number, He would find, in the darkness, but three:-

For you know, when the last "Merry Christmas" Was here with its music and store, There were three, only three, in the circle, But now it is brightened by four.

I have thought what to do for the baby,-

Of all the dear circle the best; I will borrow a stocking from grandma, And hang it along with the rest; And I'll write just a bit of a letter,

And leave it where Santa can see; He will wait just a minute to read it, When he sees there are more there than three, "Dear Santa,"-I'll say in my letter,-

" Just listen a moment to me; Pray don't be alarmed at the number, This is grandmamma's stocking you see; I borrowed it just for the baby, And hung it up slyly with these;

And he is such a dear little fellow, You may fill it as full as you please."

A HOLIDAY STORY FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

BY T. TAYLOR.

A group of merry litle folks, with a sprinkling of old folks, awaited with some impatience the important moment when the folding-doors would be thrown open, and the Christmas-tree, with its num- Jack. erous attractions, displayed for the benefit of the many curious eyes of the little spectators. Even grandmamma, in her white cap, whose clear-starched muslin covered hair almost as white as its snowy folds, shared in the general curiosity, down to flaxen-haired, lisping Maud, the four-year-old pet and plaything of the household. Her eyes were wide open, for the sandman always comes around later on Christmas-eve and other special occa- as she said :

I do believe, father, it has struck at halfpast six. Do look at it," said Jack, the eldest of the four children.

"No, Jack, look here," said Ben, his brother, "look here carefully; it's past half. Don't you see it's almost twenty-five minutes of seven?"

"Bother the minutes! Who counts them, I'd like to know?" exclaimed Jack impatiently.

"I guess mother and Uncle John need all the minutes they can get just now, in the other room; time is flying faster in there than with the impahad been playing peep-a-boo with Maud behind future Christmas would receive a similar present, the red damask. "Have you seen it, father?" asked Bell, trying to help her brother make Fritz stand on his hindlegs and beg for nothing. "Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no lies," answered her father. "You do know what it is though," she said. "Dear me; if it was only a doll as big as Maud, ly, like twinkling stars in the dusky foliage. At first, the children looked in silence at the beautiful tree, then went nearer and clustered around the ornaments, and getting so near that they could read distinctly, by the light of the wax candles, the names that were written on slips of paper attached to the different presents, which were either hanging on the tree or placed under it.

How quickly the moments then flew by! How excited they became when one little candle-light after another grew fainter and fainter, and was finally extinguished before there was any danger of it setting fire to the tree, or damaging any of its decorations! How the excitement increased, and expectation waxed greater when finally Uncle John "Something for Jack to kill time with." "Hurrah! That's jolly. A set of dominoes, as I live," said Jack, opening the box immediately, and commencing to spread them on the floor.

"A set of chess-men for Ben." "That's because your name is Ben; it rhymes with men. Don't you see? Ben-chessmen," said Jack, tumbling his dominoes back helter-skelter into the box, and leaving one or two that didn't factory known. Just opening at HANINGTON BROS., fit quite right on the floor.

"That's because it is a baby-doll. I didn't want a baby-doll, and this one isn't anything like as big as Maud."

It would take too long a time to describe all the presents. Every one was remembered—no one could feel neglected; grandmother, father, mother, old folks, and young folks were pleased, and should have been satisfied when the tree was stripped and various gifts distributed.

Uncle John held a small morocco case in his hand; every eye was fixed upon him; they all knew WINTER FABRICS.—Another lot of Scarlet Antithis contained his present, and no one can tell who shrink; Welsh, Saxony, English-domestic, Lancashire and versally on account of its intrinsic merit. The children looked at each other as their uncle "To whom does it belong?"

"That suits Ben. He is always counting the minutes, and saying: 'Take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves." "O Jack !" said Ben modestly, "that's all wrong

It's take care of the pennies." "It's all the same thing in Dutch," interrupted

"And very much the same thing in English,"

"I believe he'd rather spend five minutes than an hour any day," continued Jack.

"He was punctual for a whole mouth—he never had one bad mark, and the teacher said he wished his school-room was full of just such boys," said Bell. His mother placed her hand upon Ben's shoulder
