G. BENT.

In my chamber sit I musing, On a quiet Sunday eve. Thoughts, which come not at my choosing, Thoughts which, bidden will not leave,

Come like spectres, come to haunt me, From the graves of former time. Silent, yet I hear them taunt me, Now with folly, now with crime;

From the dead Past come to linger, In this Present far too long; Pointing back with ghostly finger To my every act of wrong Crowd they on my troubled vision, In a dark and gloomy line; Bearing each its special mission To this trembling heart of mine.

This points out a suffering neighbor Whom I eased not of his pain; That, how much of all my labor Has been given to worldly gain. This reminds of harsh words spoken, That, of sullen discontent; This recalls a promise broken,

That, the hours and days misspent. These, with stern, though sad upbraiding, Count my oft neglected prayers; Those show Faith and Hope, now fading, Withered, choked by earthly cares. Here arranged in solid column.

Each with open book in hand, Many, wearing aspect solemn, With their mournful records stand. Avarice and foul oppression,

Unjust judgment, cruel scorn, Trusts neglected, false profession, Haughty pride from meanness born; Friendship cheated, want of candor, Strife and anger, passion dire, Envy, hatred, malice, slander,

Stubborn will and base desire. Conscience, from her siumber starting, Wakens with redoubled force; Through the soul her arrows darting, Terror, anguish, keen remorse. Spectral thoughts! why thus, unbidden, From the graves of former time

Bring ye back the deeds long hidden, Deeds of folly and of crime? Hence! nor longer thus distress me: O'er the Past 'tis vain to grieve: Comes another thought—to bless me-

Softly speaks, "Repent, believe! Though as scarlet thy transgression, White as snow thy sins shall be; Christ for thee makes intercession, God, for him, will pardon thee."

Bending low in deep contrition, Now in prayer I seek relief, "Lord, forgive!" is my petition; "Help then, Lord, my unbelief!" Hope revives, the light is breaking, Spectres vanish, torments cease: Love in still, small voice is speaking, "Faith hath saved thee; go in peace!"

WORKED LIKE A MAN.

A bright little shop, a blithe little woman, whose glad smile is enough to open the heart of any cus-"And what'll you have?" she says, briskly.

"I'll have your cheerfulness, if you will sell it to me-some of it, at least." She shook her head.

"You'll have to get it in the sunshine, where I do," she said, with a merry little laugh. Failing that bargain, I turned my attention to thread and needles, and those little matters for which most women have a fancy and a use. "Things must go well with you," I said, as I paid her. And even the money slipped out of my hand into hers with cheerful alacrity.

"Well, yes, they go better than they used." she replied. "I have seen very hard times all my life long, till now; and to-morrow I am forty.' "You have no family, I suppose, Most women at your time of life show decided signs of age." She laughed again, a chip of a laugh, which sounded natural from such a fluttering, canary-like little creature.

"As to that, I think I do show my age," she re sponded. "If I don't my children do; especially my boy of twenty. "I have five children, ma'am." "How I should like to have a talk with you!" I said heartily. For under lips and eyes, and in the of my life!" flitting sadness that crossed her face for one brief second, I saw the shadow of a story that might be

"You can talk with me now, if you wish," was through an experience. her quick reply. "Mansy is through with her supper, and she tends shop evenings. It gives me a good deal of time to sew and read, and she's very womanly for her years."

"Am I to understand, then, that Mansy is your daughter?"

"Oh, yes. Samantha is her name; but she always goes by the other. She's fifteen years, old, but very small; we're not a tall people, we Browns." Just then Mansy came in, smiling like her mother. I knew she would. She had the good, honest, open kind of face that wins quicker than beauty and generally keeps what it wins. Neat was she from head to foot, with that delicate finish that imparts a look of elegance to the plainest garments. There was a glance between mother and daughter that was better than a sermon. It told that love had been a ruling power in the household.

"Come in here," said the cheery little shopkeeper, holding a door open, beyond which I could see into a room, neatly and tastefully furnished. As I expected, books and flowers greeted me; the former on shelves, and the latter on stands and in the window-seats.

"Mansy's such a hand for flowers," said the mother. "Seems as if everything she plants grows; and I think a stick would turn into leaves if she put it into the ground. Sit down, I have a little by that hour's interview with the brave little woleisure. And now what shall we talk about?"

"Yourself," said I bluntly. "Oh, dear, no; I can't say anything of myself.

I suppose my eyes asked the question; for she ORWOOD'S TINCTURE.—Norwood's Veratrum immediately said: "It has been hard, uphill work | nov 18 sometimes; but, now we are established here, we are going to get along nicely. I was not brought up to work, I am sorry to say," she added quickly, " or the struggle would never have been so hard. My father was considered wealthy till he died. He was killed before our own door, thrown from his horse, My husband was expecting to go in business with him as a partner; when at last it was found that my poor father was dreadfully embarrassed by some recent speculations.

"My husband had a little property at that time. We moved into a small house, and took my mother with us. For the first ten years we did very well; but sickness came. Rheumatic fever left my poor husband almost helpless. The bills were large for medicine and doctors; and we soon became destitute. I went round among my friends, and procured plain sewing. My mother and myself sewed ourselves almost to death; and yet we could not make both ends meet. Poverty stared us in the face. My oldest boy was ten, and a good scholar. My baby was only a year old. What to do I did not know; for poor George became worse, seeing the condition of things, I had no trade. Did not know enough of anything in the way of accomplishments to teach any of them.

"Never will I let a child grow up as I did. I of the River St. John. Living then in luxury, little did she foresee the time when she herself would come down to the stern reality of working for enough to keep soul and body together.

"There was no other way. With deep sorrow, I put my boy out for scanty wages, keeping him up in his lessons at night myself, till my husband became able to apply himself in that way; for, thank God, he has always had the use of his hands and his brains, and is a good scholar himself. Then I bethought me of a plan, and mother entered into its execution heartily; not but that she shed tears in plenty over what she then thought our fallen

"I went round, and found some people willing to entrust me with fine laces and nice clothes to do up; so, you see, in vulgar parlance, I took in washing. After that we always had just enough to pay our bills when Saturday night came round. My little girls-I have three-were all trained to do the housework; and mother and I attended to George and stopped the doctor, preferring to depend upon good nursing and nourishment.

earned the necessaries of life. I placed my girls in too. George found that he could write now and then; and he managed in that way to pay for some books and newspapers. So, while I worked, he would often read. We had to give up meat, and a good many things, except for George; but I can't say we suffered. The chidren thrived on their mush and potatoes, and did their work cheerfully. By-and-by we commenced selling a few newspapers -or Willie, my eldest boy, did; and then we got a little cotton, a few needles, and you can't think how we prospered. I laid by a small sum of money one month, when pay was more than commonly good, and invested it in little things; and that's the way our shop grew.

"After Will was fourteen, I sent him to school; and a good friend of the family helped me to put him in college, where he helped himself. He is Dishes, Vases, Faney Goods; Kitchen Goods and Goods going to be a lawyer, and a smart one too, they say. My business has increased, so that we can afford a great many comforts. My other boy, my baby, is very ambitious to follow in his brother's footsteps. My girls are industrious and good. Why, here I have been talking all this time!" and out rippled the little bird-laugh again. It was delicious.

"What are you going to do with your girls?" I

"One of them has been studying music for five years," and she pointed to a guitar-case. "She has lars a quarter. With that she clothes herself, and gives me a stated sum to put away; for you must know we include among our blessings in the future a snug little house of our own. Mary, she is eleven -will, no doubt, study for a doctor. The child had rather read a book on physiology than eat her meals, I believe; and she never sees a bone without learning all about it."

Just then my pleasant little storekeeper arose and entering, found it drawn up before an invalid
