

THE DYING CHILD TO HER DRUNKEN FATHER.

"I am weary, very weary ; come, sit beside my bed And lay your hand upon me; there-press it or my head.

And listen, father, while I speak, for soon I'm going home.

Oh! I could die so happy, if I thought that you would come.

I've heard the preacher tell you, no drunkard enters heaven

Then father, give up drinking, and pray to be for given.

O father ! will you promise that when I from earth am gone,

You'll sign the pledge and keep it, like uncle John has done ?

And, father, pray to Jesus to take all your sins away;

Oh! will you, will you promise this? Dear father don't say nay !"

The drunkard bowed his head, and the promise then was given,

And his dying child whispered : "I will pray for you in heaven :

Yes, there I'll not forget you. Oh ! I hope you'll join me soon ;

I feel that I am going, but I'm only going home."

The child fulfilled her mission, and her gentle spirit | might pass along the road. fled, vow to keep,

He longed to drown his agony, and sleep the drunkard's sleep.

But that gentle voice seemed whispering unceasing | in the world but stones! in his ear,

you in heaven."

And soon that prayer was answered, a contrite heart was given; And now he's gone to meet his child, and dwell with her in heaven. - Methodist Temperance Magazine made to Caspar, on the 25th of May, 1854, he promises to pay me a thousand dollars on the 25th of May, 1856."

Caspar was a little struck as he read the note, for, while it said that a thousand dollars were to be returned, it did not say a word about the five Constipation, Asthma, Consumption, Larhundred dollars in the sack, or whatever it might be. However, he had no doubt that the bag contained that much money, and so he started off in high glee, never expecting to travel over the road again-at any rate, never to pay back the man who had made him the loan. Caspar had passed down the narrow mountain-path, and had almost reached the broad countryroad, when he was overtaken by two men. They asked him what he had in his bag, and now he was afraid he would lose all the money which had been lent to him. They said to him : "If you will tell us the truth, then we will see the best we can do for you. If you have money in your bag, we will let you off if you give us only half of it, but if you have only stones or something else in it, then you can go along your way, and we will not take anv." As Caspar had applied to the rich man for money without any intention of paying it back again, it was quite natural that he should tell a story to save himself from these robbers. So he immediately told them that he did not have any money at all in his bag; that it was only a few crystals and other polished stones, altogether not worth over a couple of dollars, that he had picked up along the mountain stream, expecting to sell them to travellers who

"Oh !" said they, "if that is all you have, we And that father wept in anguish for his only com- | don't care anything about them; so you can go on your way." Caspar now was greatly delighted that He signed the pledge, but found it hard his solemn he had got rid of the robbers, and that the bag was still safe on his back. When he reached home, he went into his own private room and opened the bag, and what do you think there was in it? Nothing

Now, Caspar saw that he was outwitted by the "I could die happy father if I thought you'd meet rich man, who had evidently heard of his bad reputation for paying his debts, and filled his bag with stones instead of silver dollars. And then, to cap the climax, the man had his note for a thousand And his angel child seemed saying : "I'll pray for dollars, signed by Caspar himself, to be paid at the W may 19 end of two years. What should he do? He did not see how it was possible for him ever to pay the money, and the rich man himself knew that he had only given stones in Caspar's bag. If the rich man were honest, he would never expect the money to be paid him. But Caspar had given his word, and

WHAT CASPAR CARRIED ON HIS BACK.

In a little village in Silesia there once lived an honest peasant, whose name was Stephen, and who had lost all his property by means of two bad men, who had set his house on fire one night when he was away from home. His wife and children were often compelled to suffer hunger, and though it had been easy enough for him to get along before, now earned as a day-laborer were very small.

One day his wife, who noticed how sorrowful he was looking, said to him : "Do not be discouraged, for certainly better times are ahead of us. You have a rich cousin, and I am sure he will lend you a hundred dollars, so that you can have a little start once more, and you will be able to pay him back in due time." Now, Stephen had been thinking for some time of asking his cousin to make him a loan, and when he saw that his wife approved of it though he really did not like to borrow money from anybody, he immediately set off to ask the favor of his cousin. But he was received very coldly, and was told that he need expect no money from him. Stephen was now made more sorrowful than ever, and stones." so he thought, as a last resort, he would pay a visit to an old man in the mountains, who had the reputation of having plenty of money, and, if he took a notion to a person, of occasionally loaning a sum, always expecting, however, to receive a pretty good interest in return.

"What will you have of me?" said the old man as Stephen stood before his door. Can I do anything to help you ?"

his misfortune, and requested the loan of a hundred dollars.

"If you will give me at the end of two years two hundred dollars for the one hundred that I loan you now, I will let you have it."

"Very well," said Stephen; "I believe that by industry and perseverance, I shall be able to do it. "The bargain is made," replied the rich man.

He then made out the proper papers, and Stephen signed them. He then led Stephen into the back part of his house, into a small, dark room, and filled a little bag with a hundred silver dollars, and gave them to Stephen, who thanked him, the tears streaming down from his eyes, and hastened home to his wife, and told her of his good fortune ed a little piece of land, sowed it in grain, hired a horse and plough, and labored from early in the morning until late in the evening, and in one year's time had doubled his money, for his harvest had been a splendid one. When the day came for him to pay back the money, he was prompt to the hour, and gave to the old man the two hundred dollars. and thus fulfilled his bargain.

Now there lived in Stephen's neighborhood a man the money or get released from his obligation, for, after consulting a number of his own friends, they all told him that if the rich man had his note he would hold him to his word, no matter whether the loan was made in stones or dollars, and would have him imprisoned if he did not pay.

now the great question was, how he should raise

Caspar had a little property of his own, though it was a wonder how he ever kept it, for, as I have said, he never paid much attention to his promises. But now he found himself in a bad fix, and after thinking the matter over, he come to the conclusion that the best thing for him to do was to go to work it was almost impossible, for the wages which he to earn the thousand dollars as best he could, and go to the rich man and offer him the money. He now saw that his great mistake was in allowing his greedy nature to overcome him, and to ask the rich man to loan him so much money, and that he was foolish enough not to untie the bag and see if the money was really in it before he left the rich man's presence. Being placed in this bad situation, he went to work in right good earnest to fulfil his bargain, and, sure enough, at the end of two years' time, he appeared before the door of the rich man in the mountains, with the same sack in which he had carried away the stones two years before. "Here," said he, " I come to give you one thousand dollars, though you have only loaned me

The rich man now saw that his scheme proved successful. Having learned a great deal of Caspar's unfaithfulness to his word, he had determined that, if ever the opportunity came, he would cure him of it if possible ; and then, when he saw that the promptly answered. Address man to whom he had loaned was really true to his word, he invited him to take a seat, and then told him the whole story, as follows : "I knew when you came to borrow money of me

Stephen told him, in simple words, the story of that you had a bad name for keeping your word, and I determined to cure you of it if possible. I know that I have my faults, and that everybody regards me as a penurious man, and I have been led by your bad reputation to pay a little better attention to my own heart, and as soon as you had received my loan, two years ago, I turned over a new leaf, and have since distributed more money for good ourposes than all my previous life. My own in- JOHN SMITH, tention to cure you of your faithlessness has thus had its effect on me. I gave you only stones in your bag, and you gave me a promise to pay me back money. I now think that your severe discipline will prove of benefit to you all your life. I will take the thousand dollars from you now, and will give you good interest for it, and just as soon Stephen now went to work in good earnest, rent- as I am fully convinced that you have learned to keep your word toward everybody else as well as CARLETON AIR-TIGHT COOKING STOVES. toward me, you shall have the entire sum back

Thus ended the conversation between the rich | terms. man and Caspar, and they separated on very good terms. As Caspar walked down towards his home, he felt that he had learned a lesson for life, and, as the rich man was left alone and thought over the whole affair, he, too, devised plans for usnamed Caspar, who had heard how Stephen had re- ing his property to better advantage than he had ver done. Both of these men are living still, and make application to the same man in the mountains | it would be hard for any one to discover in the conduct of either of them a trace of their former by no means a reliable man; he often made pro- bad qualities. So let nobody say after this that a mises, but seemed to care little about them when person who is not naturally fond of keeping his word cannot become a better man, and that a missmall farming eutensils, and very seldom would re- erable miser cannot be changed to a person of great benevolence, and that a person who has a bad name Having got into difficulties, and finding nobody cannot have a good one, if he will only live a better life .- Methodist.

"Please to stay here until I return," said the man. " when the papers must be made out."

After about half an hour, the man returned with a bag half filled with something that was heavy enough to be gold, and when Caspar saw it he was overjoyed, for it seemed to be money enough to last him all his life. The truth was he never intended to pay it back again, and he looked upon it as so much clear gain.

The paper which the old man who made the loan wrote for Caspar to sign read thus : "For the loan | happier.
