HIDDEN CROSSES.

I do not ask from Thee, O Lord, A cup of reddest wine; I do not ask for brightest beams Upon my path to shine; I do not ask in fullest fields My busy scythe to sway;

I only ask for strength to lift The crosses in my way. Those nameless crosses Thou alone, By any power, canst see,

So subtly covered from all ken

But Thy full sympathy; Those dim-lined crosses, wreathed with flower Which friends unwitting weave, And by imperfect human act The wounded spirit grieve.

I do not ask, O gracious Lord, For bliss bestowed on none-To know and to be fully known By each beloved one; I only ask, oh! tenderest Love, Since none our hearts may guess, For bravery to bear the thorns That 'neath the roses press.

The ponderous cross we cannot hide-Incentive to despair-Invokes the martyr in our breasts Which sternly helps to bear

A measured burden all deplore; But human sympathy Is slow to touch the hidden cross, Thy clear eyes only see.

Thou who alone of all our friends Hast tasted every cup,

And by the bitterness of each Knowest to bear us up; Oh! give me grace to wear my cross A secret still with Thee, And live in the sustaining power Of Thy sufficiency.

THE LITTLE BOATS.

Down by the sea, lived Dan the fisherman, with his wife, and little son, who was called Dandelion because he wore yellow pinafores, and had curly, yellow hair, that covered his head with a golden fuzz. A very happy family, for Dan was kind and industrious-Hetty, his wife, a cheerful busy creature, and Dandelion the jolliest three-year-old baby who ever made sand-pies and paddled on the

But one day, a great trouble came to them. Dan and his fellow fisherman sailed blithely away as usual and Hetty watched the fleet of white-winged boats out of the bay, thinking how pretty they looked with the sunshine on them; while Dandelion stood clapping his chubby hands, and saying, as he always did, "Daddy tummin' soon." But Daddy did not come soon that time; for a great storm arose, and when some of the boats came scudding home at nightfall, Dan's was not among them. All night, the gale raged, and in the morning, Dan's boat lay empty and broken on the shore. His mates shook their heads when they saw the wreck, and drew their rough hands over their eyes; for Dan was a good seaman, and they knew he never would desert his boat alive. They looked for him far and wide, but could hear nothing of him, and felt sure that he had perished in the storm. They tried to comfort poor Hetty, but she would not be comforted Her heart seemed broken; and if it had not been for her baby, her neighbors feared that she would have gone to join Dan in his grave under the sea. Dandelion didn't understand why every one was so sad, and why his father stayed away so long but he never lost his cheerfulness, never gave up hoping, or stopped saying, with a contented smile, "Daddy tummin' soon." The sunshiny little face sea, or drift them far out from the land. was Hetty's only comfort. The sight of the fuzzy yellow head, bobbing round the house, alone made it endurable; and the touch of the loving babylong to end her sorrow in the sea.

People don't believe in fairies nowadays; nevertheless, good spirits still exist, and help us in our times of trouble, better even than the little people we used to read about. One of these household ago is a very serious matter now, and they look spirits is called Love, and it took the shape of Dandelion to comfort poor Hetty. "Yes, I shall see my dear good Dan again, if I wait patiently. Baby takes comfort in saying that I will, too; though the poor dear will get tired of it soon," she said.

But Dandelion didn't get tired. He firmly believed what he said, and nothing could change his mind. He had been much troubled at seeing the boat laid up on the beach, all broken and dismandecided that Daddy was waiting somewhere for a new boat to be sent to bring him home. This idea was so strong, that the child gathered together his go out on the ocean of life without chart, compass store of toy-boats-for he had many, as they were his favorite playthings, and lanched them, one after another, telling them to find his father, and bring him home.

As Dandelion was not allowed to play on the beach, except at low tide, the little boats sailed safely on the receding waves, and the child was | will bear being printed often again. Hetty used to humor the child, though it made her heart ache to know that the light shone in vain. At such times, Dandy would prance about the room in his little shirt, and talk about Daddy as happily never have happened. as if long months had not passed without bringing him back. When fairly in his big old-fashioned cradle, the boy would lie, looking more like a dan- the children of the Newcastle on Tyne Ragged and delion than ever, in his yellow-flannel nightgown, Industrial Schools, the word scold occurred in a lesplaying with his toes, or rocking himself to and fro, son, upou which the inspector asked the question : calling the cradle his boat, and blithely telling his mother that he was sailing "far 'way to find Daddy." closed and the golden head lay still, looking so pretty, with the circle of bright hair above the rosy face. "My little saint," Hetty called him; and though she often wept sadly, as she watched him, the bitterness of her grief passed away, and a patient hope came to her; for the child's firm faith impressed her deeply, the pious music of the sweet old hymn comforted her sore heart, and daily labour kept her cheerful in spite of herself. The neighbors wondered at the change that came over her; but she could not explain it, and no one knew that the three good spirits, called Love, Labor and Hope, were working their pleasant miracles. Six long months went by, and no one ever thought of seeing Dan again- no one but his little son, who still watched for him here, and his wife, who waited for him hereafter.

The faithful little soul had not forgotten his father, but had come to the conclusion, that the reason his boats never prospered was because they hadn't large enough sails; so, he was intent in rigging a new boat, lately given him, with a sail that could not fail to waft Dan safely home. With his mouth puckered up, his downy eyebrows knit, and both hands pulling at the big needle, he was so wrapt in his work that he did not mind the stopping of the wheel when Hetty fell JOHN SMITH, - - - - PROPRIETOR. into a reverie, thinking of the happy time when she and Dan would meet again.
