In the reign of Louis XIV. one of the most magnificent spectacles was supposed to be the general to be the highest achievement of modern civilizain doubt. It is probable that Rome, except in the rare instances of festal illuminations, was left in darkposed to robbers and stumbling over obstacles. Antioch, in the fourth century the splendid capital of the East, seems to have set the example of susaround its public buildings. Constantine ordered Constantinople to be illuminated on every Easter eve with lamps and wax-candles. All Egypt was lighted up with tapers floating on vessels of oil at the flight of Catiline, with a display of lanterns and

About 1618 the citizens were ordered to place a lamp in front of their houses every night during winter, but as late as 1736 the rule was imperfectly obeyed: robbers filled narrow streets, and life and property were never safe in the darkness. Glass lamps were next introduced at public ex pense; their number was rapidly increased and towards the close of the last century the citizens of STEAM ENGINE AND MACHINE SHOP. Novelists and poets celebrated the nightly illumination of the overgrown capital. Vienna, Berlin, and the other European cities tollowed the example of London or Paris, and New York and Philadelphia early adopted the custom. Rome alone, still clinging to the usages of the Middle Ages, refused to light its streets; the popes steadily opposed the heretical invention, and preferred darkness to light.

At length came a wonderful advance; for three centuries civilization had valued itself upon its brilliancy. The Chinese, who seem to have orig-"Perhaps he may, dear.
