"IT IS I."

The lone and toiling voyagers Whose bark was on the sea, When night hung dark above the wave On stormy Galilee, In terror gazed on what they then But dimly could descry, Until they heard those cheering words : "Fear not, for it is L"

The dearest truest Friend on earth, In that dark hour of gloom, Seemed some pale phantom come to tell A dire and dreadful doom ; And then from each affrighted lip There burst the trembling cry, That naught could still but those sweet words : "Fear not, for it is L"

'Tis often thus with voyagers Across life's stormy main, Who strive to stem its rushing tide, Yet seem to strive in vain ; The waves are white with spectral fears, And darkly frowns the sky. Till some sweet voice speaks softly out : "Fear not, for it is I."

Oh, ever thus, my sister dear, When life scems dark to thee ; When clouds enwrap a starless sky, And storms are on the sea-In fearless faith and joyful hope To Christ lift up thine eye, And heed the gentle voice that says, "Fear not, for it is I."

PROCRASTINATION. BY MRS. H. W. BEECHER.

An inclination to put off till to-morrow that which were more appropriately done to-day, seems quite natural to almost every one, but it is one of the symptoms of depravity, and the earlier it is fought and conquered the better. There are some sensible mothers whose constant endeavor is to prevent this habit from gaining a foothold in their children's characters. From earliest childhood they watch and nip it in the bud. Thos lue of the prompt, regular performance of each duty, however small. child is perhaps disinclined-thinks one more little nap would be comfortable. But it is time to prepare for breakfast, and what is gained by delay is nothing but the first lesson in selfish indulgence and procrastination. The child does not need it, If it went to bed, as it should have done, when the birds folded their heads under their wings, it requires no more sleep. A few gentle words or caresses will soon chase all traces of slumber from bright eyes, and the little one, merry as the birds, is soon ready for breaktast. While children are very young begin this education, and see that it is distinctly understood that no excuse but illness can avail. They must be up at a given hour, and by the time they are twelve years old you will find it difficult to keep your little girls and boys in bed beyond the regular time. You have thus established a habit of early rising which will cling to them though life,-that is, if their mother gently and lovingly impress upon their minds what they would lose by delay and gain by promptness. But, although a stern and severe compulsion may secure obedience while under your eye, by that course you make the act so disagreeable and repulsive, by associating it with your stern manner, that they are tempted to rush to the other extreme whenever they can do so with Children naturally love play better than work or study; but it is better that they early learn that there is something besides play which even little girls and boys can and must do. They, of course with no evil intention, will be inclined to stretch the play hour of recess a little beyond the appointed time. It is the parent's duty to watch and guard against this, not on account of the real good or zigzag lines across. The lines at the sides are which a young child might accomplish in these few the fibres which form the walls or outside of the extra moments, but for the sake of establishing a habit which will be of infinite service for the child in after years, that the discipline, though for the hair gradually diminishes to a point must overlap present not joyous, may work for its future happiness and usefulness. Therefore, make the hours for having bark, fiber, and sometimes pith in the midrecreation as frequent as seemeth to you good, only dle. let it be distinctly understood that when that time expires there must be no delay, no procrastination. As the child grows older and able to exercise a little judgment it will soon become conscious of the loss incurred by dilatoriness, and the gain secured by a prompt performance of duty. A judicious will fully corroborate her teachings. The penalty done now until ' by and by,' generally follows very speedily after the omission.

No one is more strongly tempted to put off till a more convenient season, here and there, some minor duty than a housekeeper whose cares are many, and helpers very few. A few experiments in this most excusable of all procrastinations will teach the folly of the attempt to add to the already filled register of the next day's work the duties of the present time.

Some friends have just left your house. During their visit much work accumulated, while you felt bound to entertain your guests. Either you are with no help but your own hands, or your servants are very busy, and you say, "I'll take off the soiled lincn from the bed, and leave the room to air a few days, or till a more convenient season."

The airing is all very proper, but two or three days are not needed for it, and if you leave the bed unmade you will not find it wise or at all labor saving in the end. Let the room and bed air until you are ready to take off the sheets and pillow-cases that need to be changed. When you go up to do that, take with you the clean articles, and being there, why not finish the work and leave all in order?
