

Poetry.

LEFT ALONE AT EIGHTY.

What did you say, dear breakfast?
Somehow I've slept too late;
You are very kind, dear Edie.
Go tell them not to wait.
I'll dress as quick as ever I can,
My old hands tremble sore,
And Polly, who used to help, dear heart!
Lies 't'other side o' the door.

Put up the old pipe, deary,
I couldn't smoke to-day;
I'm sort o' dazed and frightened,
And don't know what to say.
It's loneliness in the house, here,
And loneliness out o' door—
I never knew what loneliness meant,
In all my life, before.

The bees go humming, the whole day long,
And the first June rose has blown,
And I am eighty, dear Lord, to-day,
Too old to be left alone;
O heart of love so still and cold,
O precious lips, so white—
For the first dead years in sixty years,
You were out of my reach, last night.

You've cut the flower. You're very kind.
She rooted it, last May;
It was only a slip; I pulled the rose,
And threw the stem away;
But she, sweet, thrifty soul, bent down,
And planted it where she stood,
"Dear, maybe the flowers are living," she said,
"Asleep, in this bit of wood."

I can't rest, deary—I cannot rest;
Let the old man have his will,
And wander from porch to garden post—
The house is so desolate still;
Wander, and long for a sight of the gate
She has left ajar for me—
We had got so used to each other, dear,
So used to each other, you see.

Sixty years, and so wise and good,
She made me a better man
From the moment I kissed her fair young face,
And our love's life began.
And seven fine boys she has given me,
And out of the seven, not one
But the noblest father in all the land
Would be proud to call his son.

O, well, dear Lord, I'll be patient,
But I feel so broken up;
At eighty years it's an awful thing
To drain such a bitter cup.
I know there's Joseph, and John, and Hal,
And four good men beside,
But a hundred sons couldn't be me
Like the woman I made my bride.

My little Polly, so bright and fair;
So winsome, and good, and sweet;
She had roses twined in her sunny hair,
White roses on her dainty feet;
And I held her hand—Was it yesterday
That we stood up to be wed?
And—No, I remember, I'm eighty to-day,
And my dear wife, Polly, is dead.

Miscellaneous.

FARMER STANTON'S APPLES.

A small group of boys were standing on the lawn in front of Somerville Academy. The topic of conversation seemed to be unusually exciting, for their voices were lowered, and their faces flushed. Higher and higher rose the excitement, till at last one of the boys stepped forward, saying in a lower tone, as he laid his hand on the shoulder of a manly-looking boy who had formed the centre of the group, but who was moving slowly from it:

"Yane, I ask you once more, will you join us?"

A clear, firm, decided "No," was the prompt reply.

"Coward!" fell from the lips of the first speaker, and "coward" was echoed by nearly every boy in the group.

For one moment Arthur Yane's eyes flashed, the quick blood mounted to his forehead, his lips moved as if about to speak; but in an instant his whole countenance changed, and looking calmly and unflinchingly in the face of the boy who seemed to be the leader, he replied:

"Yes, a coward! Too much a coward to do a thing that I know to be wrong. You and I, Hugh, have repeated too many times, 'My duty toward God,' and 'My duty toward my neighbor,' to forget that the one teaches us to keep his commandments, and the other not to covet or desire other men's goods, and to keep our hands from picking and stealing. Better a thousand times to ask Mr. Stanton for his apples, than to go in a cowardly, sneaking way, and steal them. I tell you boys, you'll be sorry for you do it. Better think again."

"What a fuss to make over a few apples! I phaw! your pious air won't go down; our Hugh is made up already," was the reply of Hugh; "we'll have the sport as well as the privilege of testing old Stanton's 'Perfections'; lots of fun there'd be in asking for them, wouldn't there? If that's your way, do it; but I tell you, you'll miss a jolly time."

A pity turned and left them, but for a long time could catch the unkind remarks hurled after him by his schoolmates.

For miles around there was not another such farm as that of "Farmer" Stanton. Every thing that he touched seemed to prosper. The musical "peep, peep," of his chickens could be heard before there was an indication of spring; his vegetables were always first in market; his golden, rosy butter, always brought a higher price than that of his neighbors, and his orchard was a marvel to every one. I could tell you of downy, blushing peaches, of pears most delicious, which weighed the most and brought the highest premium; of grapes that would literally "make one's mouth water," but it is of one apple-tree that I have the most to tell this time.

There was a limpid, rippling brook running through the orchard, and overhanging this brook was a large tree bowed down by the weight of its fruit. The apples were of a dark crimson without, glossy and smooth as satin; within, they were a rich cream color, and in their delicate, luscious flavor, unlike any other apple known in that vicinity. For want of a name, Mr. Stanton called it "Perfection," and those who tasted the fruit, thought it rightly named.

It was a lovely evening, the brook glided quietly on, reflecting the calm, beautiful moon, as it seemed to sail along, throwing its silver light on all around, a gentle breeze just stirred the leaves, and naught disturbed the quiet save the occasional plaintive cry of the whip-poor-will. The quiet was too holy to be marred by aught of sin. But soon suppressed voices and stealthy footsteps were heard, which seemed to follow the course of the brook, and finally stopped beneath the apple-tree which was the pride of Mr. Stanton's orchard.

The moon looked down on four boys, each the child of a loving mother, whose heart would have ached had she seen the danger of her son. All who can doubt that the prayers of that moment, arising from the promptings of mother-love, were heard in heaven?

There was a whispered consultation as to who should climb the tree; and after some discussion, still in a suppressed tone, the question was decided, and Hugh Carleton was just preparing for a spring, when the pleasant voice of Farmer Stanton greeted them with: "Ah, my lads, good evening! Has the beauty of the evening tempted you out for a stroll?" And, without waiting for a reply from the astonished lads, continued: "Well, I know of no rambler more pleasant than along the brook; it often tempts me to follow its windings up to the village. But where are my thoughts? You've taken a long walk, if you are from the village, as I suppose. Come in, my lads, come in and rest you, and you'll enjoy the walk home all the better for it."

At this, the boys found their tongues sufficiently to protest, pleading lateness, lessons to learn, and various other objections; but Mr. Stanton overruled them all, and the boys soon found themselves— they scarcely knew how, and much against their inclination—the guests of the man they would have robbed. There was not one who would have sought the eye of the other, or looked in the face of the good man, they were so filled with shame.

Presently a servant came in, bearing a large dish of the much-coveted apples; also dishes of other fruits from his orchard. He cordially invited the boys to partake of it freely, helping them with an unsparing hand saying as he did so, that "God had blessed him with such an abundant harvest that it was not only a pleasure, but a duty to share it with his neighbors."

There was a vain attempt to eat the fruit, but every mouthful almost choked them, and the kind voice of their host, as he urged it upon them, talking pleasantly all the while, "pierced like a two-edged sword."

At last Hugh Carleton could bear it no longer, and bravely stepping forward—for it requires more courage to acknowledge one's self wrong than to commit the wrong—said: "Mr. Stanton, your kindness to us is more than we deserve, for we came here to—" but Mr. Stanton stopped him, saying: "Say no more, my lad, I know it all; your young friend was right; 'Better a thousand times ask for a thing than go in a cowardly, sneaking manner to steal it.'"

The astonishment of the boys knew no bounds. How could he have known their conversation? Could Arthur Yane have betrayed them?

Mr. Stanton saw their astonishment, and added, "I trust you will never again be inclined to arrange a foraging expedition; but where secrecy is desired, it is not well to stand within hearing distance of your teacher."

A look of dismay crossed their faces, for they remembered that in their excitement their voices were loud, and they were not far away from the school-room.

"Now, my lads, I advise you to confess your fault to your teacher, who is my friend, as freely as you have to me; and the sooner you do so, the easier it will be for you," saying which he stepped from the room, and immediately returned with his teacher. They were so overwhelmed with mingled feelings of shame, confusion, and contrition for their intended sin, that they could not speak. He told them of overbearing their conversation, and that, after deliberation, he and Mr. Stanton decided upon this as the most salutary lesson which they could receive.

In a few words, kindly, but earnestly spoken, he told them of the great crimes which often were the result of just such "little things" as they had thought this, and that though they had been prevented from committing the sin itself, their intentions remained the same, and for that they were guilty in the sight of God; to him should their confession be made humbly and reverently. Then, after commending them to his love and protection, earnestly imploring his forgiveness, he bade them return to the village, trusting they would never again be guilty of attempting even to violate their duty to God and their neighbor.

There were few words spoken as they walked home; each was busy with his own thoughts; and when the morning came, and Arthur Yane appeared among them, the hand of each was extended, with an earnest and sincere "Forgive us, Arthur, you were right, and we were wrong."

When their teacher presented Arthur Yane with an elegant basket of the finest fruit, from Mr. Stanton, you were right, and we were wrong."

WATCHMAKING IN SWITZERLAND.

[From the Swiss Times of May 30th.] WE have already drawn attention to the annual meeting of the Society of Arts, held on the 23rd current, under the presidency of M. Th. de Saussure, and are now able to furnish some further details. Professor Sorel, in delivering a most interesting report, passed in review the operations of the Industrial section, in reference to Commerce, laying great stress upon the competition that has taken place in the manufacture of chronometers. This institution was instituted with the object of testing the workmanship and precision of chronometers turned out by Geneva manufacturers, and none but those adopted for pocket use were admitted. They were deposited in charge of the authorities at the Observatory, and underwent the most searching ordeal possible to be applied to pocket instruments of this class. The jury specially retained to decide the difficult question to whom to award the palm of excellence unanimously decided in favor of Messrs. J. M. Badollet & Co. This firm having carried off the sole prize by exhibiting a chronometer which fulfilled in the highest degree every condition required, and the most complete success by gaining honorable mention for two other chronometers. The allusion to this triple honor was received with enthusiastic applause, and President Humbert, President of the Fine Arts Section closed the meeting with happy and humorous dissertation upon subjects connected with this department. An assortment of GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, of the different grades, from the eminent manufacturers above referred to, always kept in stock by PAGE BROTHERS, 41 King Street. Agents for Messrs. J. M. Badollet & Co., Watch and Chronometer Manufacturers, Geneva, Switzerland. (mar 28)
