THE RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCIER.

Poetry. RAISED TO LIFE. BY "ZIP." Lazarus of Bethany was dead, and the Jews had come To comfort Martha and her sister Mary. The sisters loved their brother, and now that he was gone, Their hearts were sad. Their hope and home-stay had been snatched from them. the woods. And lay cold and lifeless in the tomb. They had looked upon their brother as he passed the portals, They had listened to the death "farewell," And this home, the haunt of Jesus in his weary hours, Seemed desolate. To Jesus on the other side of Jordan Word had come that Lazarus was sick. Mary was sent to Him For aid and comfort, knowing that He Whose heart e'er throbbed in sympathy With the sick and sorrowful, could find relief

For their hurt minds. When word has come, After remaining two days in the place, Jesus makes ready that he again may enter Where the Jews of late had sought to kill him ; He has a mission to perform, and recking not his life.

Departs to meet the mourning ones.

Mary Temained at home deep buried in her grief, But Martha rushes forth to meet her Lord When earliest tidings come of his approach, And with a simple faith exclaims, " Lord, if thou hadst been here My brother had not died." O! faith like this, O! child-like trust in God ! Yet with the fullest faith, the words of Christ, "That Lazarus should rise again,"-Must then have seemed like simple declaration Of his resurrection at the last. Little could she have thought that yet a little And she should grasp the hand of him recovered From the noisome tomb. She hastens to her sister Mary and relates "The Master's come and calleth for thee." Quickly comes Mary forth to greet him, Echoing yet again the words and faith of Martha, "Lord, if thou hadst been here My brother had not died."

The Jews had followed Mary to this place out of the town, Thinking that she had gone to weep upon her brother's grave, And now they wept, while Jesus, Summoned to the place where they had laid him, Weeps likewise. O ! love like this! Twice only on the earth was Jesus known to weep : Once for the sins of wicked Jews, And once because a friend was dead. Never had the tear-drop glistened on his cheek

I FORGOT.

" James, have you seen the hatchet ?" asked Mr. Carter, coming into the room where the children were studying their lessons.

" Oh, father ! I left it out on the bench yesterday. I forgot to bring it in !" " And it rained all night!" said his father.

"Will you ever learn to remember, James ?" "Jim would lose his head if it wasn't fast to his shoulders," said Tom laughing. "Shall I get you my hatchet, father ? I manage to keep it since I stopped lending it to James, the forgetful !"

"James, did you post the letter I gave you this morning ?" asked his mother, looking up from her sewing, at this moment.

"Oh, mamma ! I met George Hayes, and he took me to see his new squirrel, and"-

"You forgot the letter. Well, my son, you will have to bear the penalty of your carelessness this time yourself. Your Uncle Will wrote to invite you to spend your birthday with him, and was to meet you at the station. The letter you forgot was an acceptance of the invitation, but it is too late now to send it."

"O, mamma ! why did you not tell me ?" "Because I wish, if possible, to have you re member such errands as a duty to me not a pleasure to be gained for yourself." James looked very blue for a moment, then h looked up, bravely crushing back his tears. "I will try to remember, after this ! I will scour up the hatchet, father, and I must try to have a good time at home on my birthday." But his voice quivered a little here, for a day at Uncle Will's was a pleasure not easily given up. Uncle Will lived in the city, and was very apt to find time to visit the Museum, or give some equally rare treat to his little country relatives when they came to visit him. Carter tried so hard to overcome his great fault of them alone severely, pay no attention to them, forgetfulness that his parents began to hope he was learning to remember such directions as they gave him, and the little habits of carefulness that make were found in their proper place, his hat hung upon its own peg, and his share of choring was performed at the regular time. But, little by little, the old in any sum. habit returned, at first in trifling matters, but gradually extending, as before, to errands of importance, or neglect of imperative duties.

"I forgot " was heard again, as before, as the ever, in the precise language of the Organ, excuse for neglect and inattention, till it really May there not be added to the above another emed as if the bad habit had become second na- class, which, for the sake of uniformity, may be the Organ is somewhat after the following style : 1. Monkey drunk, wherein a man grins, makes all his mind that she should have no occasion to do sorts of grimaces, leaps or dances, looks silly, and this. He thought it would not be so very hard to TOBACCO.-100 boxes and thinks himself well rewarded if he can but excite do this, except in his lessons. He was not a very TOBACCO. body. Sometimes wants to put his huge arms fain hug or paw you as would a bear; then looks he wouldn't have any time for play. But still his sleepy, walks sluggishly, and finally becomes so bearish that nothing but a fight will satisfy him. 3. Tiger drunk, when, in his own estimation he can wrestle with Ajax, fight with Samson, and jump over the moon. His eyes flash with a vengeance that nothing but blood can satisfy. This unfortunate creature generally winds up his drunk play and work. Geography lessons, spelling lesby abusing his wife and children, and quarreling with his best neighors and friends. 4. Hog drunk, when he rolls in the mud and filth; when the ditch or sewer is as good a couch to him as a feather-bed, and when he grants and whines for more drink as swine do for more swill. 5. Dog drunk, when he snaps and snarls, shows his teeth, runs this way and that way, and betokens madness to such an extent as to suggest the necessity of a straight jacket, or of knocking him on the head to prevent the spread of hydrophobia. 6. Hound drunk, when he whines and weeps, would grasp your hand, would lean upon you, beslaver you in the excess of his love. He loves you very much, says you are his best and dearest friend, would fight for you, risk his life for you, do anything for you. This poor creature is to be pitied. Whiskey seems to have softened his brain, if, indeed, he had any brain, and made a complete fool of him, provided he were not a fool by nature. 7. Owl drunk, in which the unfortunate creature is fain to suppose that the wisdom of the world centres in himself. He knows it all, can bear no contradiction, pities the ignorance of all contradictors, and looks on them with ineffable contempt and disgust. You must not differ with him in politics, or law, or religion, commerce or manufactures. You must not differ with him in anything nearly to the end of her first voyage in safety. for he knows it all, and all about it. Then again, he is the richest man in all the country, has the best farm or house, is doing the best business, has the loveliest wife and smartest children, the finest horses, the fiercest dogs, and the best of everything else worth having at all, that can be found anywhere or among any people on the face of the earth. There is nothing to be compared to him or to his, and if you dispute it you make a mortal enemy. You cannot teach him anything. Solomon was a mere child to him, and all other whom the world has esteemed as wise and great are, in his estimation, mere waifs on the current of time, and not to be compared with his august self. The For some weeks after this sharp lesson, James only way to manage such poor ninnies is to let which, perhaps, is the greatest mortification to which you can subject them.

And he did try. From that day he began to e diligent. He studied his lessons, and did every thing else with all his might. When he got hrough with going to school he was bound apprenice to a blacksmith. He remembered this lesson of diligence, and practiced it here too. He swung his hammer with a will, and made the anvil ring again. All the old laziness which he had when a oy was overcome. He was active, industrious, and diligent, not only in his trade but in everything. He became a christian and joined the church, and was as diligent in his religion as he was in his business. He was known to be the best blacksmith in all that part of England in which he lived. He never slighted anything. Whatsoever his hand found to do he did it with his might. And now see what came of this habit of diligence. DILIGENCE SAVING A SHIP. The London Missionary Society had resolved to uild a missionary ship. One of the missionaries who was going out in her had been the Sunday school teacher of Abel Baker. He knew what a good blacksmith he was, and he got him engaged to make one of the anchors and chains for the ship, for he knew it would be well made. The vessel is finished and furnished, and has gone on her way

But will the anchor be able to hold her? No. A huge wave strikes the ship; a loud crack is heard, the chain is snapped, and the ship is drifting again towards the breakers. "Let go another anchor." It goes and fails like the first. A third is tried but with no better success. There is one left. This is a smaller one than any of the others, and the chain a good deal lighter. They all look at it in doubt and fear. It doesn't seem worth while to try that slender thing when the heavy chains had snapped like thread. "Try it, try it," says one of the nissionaries; " my old scholar, Abel Baker made it, and I know it's made in the best way that a chain can be made."

Away goes Abel Baker's anchor. It is their last hope. If that fails then they were gone. How anxiously they watch the result. It has reached
