HIS TURN.

It was on the afternoon of the 24th of December, and John, wrapped up in his new overcoat, was going down-town, with a hop and a jump, to spend his last coppers for a Christmas present. He was six years old, and as he went along he tried to whistle "Shoo Fly," like the big boys; and wondered to himself why Christmas didn't come more than once a year, and if they'd ever get to coming oftener, and if they'd been going on like this before he was born-as he dodged the mothers hurrying home with dolls' heads peeping out of newspaper parcels, and fathers with fat turkeys by the legs, and market-women haggling over their poultry, and workmen carrying green Christmas trees-and stopped to look into the gay shop-windows and at the crowd of good-humored buyers and sellers. He was bound for the silversmith's himself, to buy his mother a real silver thimble, to save her gold one, and because he had smelted the other in the shovel over the diningroom fire, in order to turn it into ploughshares and pruning-hooks, with the aid of a bowl of cold water, thinking she didn't need two thimbles and a sewing-machine. He was going to put his purchase into her stocking; and when she waked up in the morning, wouldn't she be surprised and laugh to find another silver thimble there, just where her toe ought to be? After he had bought his present, the confusion of street-lamps and turn home that evening. early twilight and the jostling, hurrying crowd bewildered him, and he struck out by mistake, into a narrow alley, where he stopped, attracted by a ragged urchin, who was gazing wistfully in at a baker's holiday display of smoking loaves saying and tarts.

"I say, don't you almost taste 'em ?" said the urchin, capering first on one foot and then on the other to keep himself warm.

"They aren't anything to my mother's tarts," answered John, remembering the pastry at home.

"You ain't hungry, I'll bet!" "No; but I'm going home to supper."

"Wish I was!"

"Why don't you go, then ?" "'Cause there ain't any to go to." "No supper ! Why, everybody has supper. It's Christmas Eve, you know !"

"Christmas Eve? What's that ?" "Why, don't you know?"

". The night before Christmas, When all through the house Not a creature was stirring, Not even a mouse,"
