That of all we have striven for little is won, And of all the work our strength has done, How little was worth the doing. So most of us travel with very poor speed, Failing in thought where we conquer in deed ; Least brave in the hour of greatest need, And making a riddle that few may read, Of our life's intricate mazes. Such a labyrinth of right and wrong, It is strange that a heart once brave and strong Should falter at last, and most earnestly long For a calm sleep under the daisies!

But if one poor troubled heart can say, "His kindness softened my life's rough way," And the tears fall over the lifeless clay, We shall stand up in heaven in brighter array Than if all earth rang with our praises ; For the good we have done shall never fade, Though the work be wrought and wages paid, And the wearied frame of the laborer laid All peacefully under the daisies.

Alone with grandma, Janet wished for better things, and wondered why she was so harshly dealt with.

At last even the society of her aged comforter was denied her, and in her bed the old lady gradually faded away. Day and night Janet sat beside her, with the knowledge that she was beyond earthly help-waiting upon her, yielding to the childish whims, and shutting out everything youth ful and beautiful from her sight.

" Playing household-angel," Maragaret said. "Working for grandma's fortune of old shoes and worsted stockings," Lettie cruelly added. "Doing her duty by the faithful woman who had taken the three motherless children into her heart, and filled the lost one's place so far as God permitted," her own heart said, and steadily she worked on.

The first day of May brought invitations to the last ball at the Bosworth house, and while the two elder sisters laid out their finery, Janet folded her tiny missive, and hid it away next to her heart as a secret bit of paper, bearing Austin's firm broad chirography upon it.

That night grandma was very ill, and when Margaret and Lettie fluttered in with their gay dresses, Janet met them, and almost forcibly pat
