BY REV. R. H. HOWARD.

When Cyrus the Great, King of Persia, was thirteen years of age, his mother, Mandana, took him with her into Media, to the palace of his grandfather, Astyages, who from the many things he had heard in his favor had a great desire to see him. In this court young Cyrus found morals and manners differing very widely from those prevailing among his own far more simple and Puritanical people." Pride, luxury and magnificence reigned here almost supreme. Astyages humself was sumptuously arrayed, and embellished with every conceivable variety of costly and dazzling decoration. All this finery and display, however, strange to say, seems to have produced but very little, if indeed any, effect upon the susceptible mind of young Cyrus. Careful neither to criticize or condemn arything he saw, he was yet quite content to continue to live in the same abstemiou and temperate way he had been brought up.

Upon some occasion during this visit it appears that one Sacas, the King's cup-bearer, had in some way incurred the resentment of the young prince. away. If so inconsiderable a service as that can win your distinguished favor, you shall see how quickly I will win it myself, for I will take it upon me in all respects to serve you better than he."

Cyrus immediately equipped himself as cupbearer, and then, advancing with all proper gravity, knowing wink, said :-with his napkin on his shoulder and his cup nicely balanced on his three fingers, he presented the latter to the monarch with a dexterity and grace that won the heartiest applause from both the king and Mandana, his mother.
