ess ones, and be thankful, humble,

The day after Christmas and Sunday at that, When Jennie and Johnnie fell into a chat; Old Nick with his reindeers had driven away And left in the snow but the track of E's sleigh ; The noise of his prancers had died with the morn The stockings were empty, the trees were all bare And scattered their fruit like the leaves on the air

The gifts had been given, the blessings were said And merry old Christmas was now with the dead. The day after Christmas and Sunday at that, And Jennie and Johnnie were full at their chat ; Their pillow last night had been thoroughly wet With many big tears of their childish regret ;

For Santa had driven all through the great town, And into the chimneys had thrown his gifts down : Had packed all the stockings and covered the trees, And other folks' children were up to their knees Secrounded with gifts, and chock full of delight, As well they remembered the joys of that night. Bat Jennie and Johnnie, how coald they be glad, For Christmas was gone and no presents they had. "I woulder," said Jennie,-she spoke with a sigh, A pearl of a tear dropped out of her eye,-"I wonder if Santa Claus could have forgot, Or whether he meant just to slight us or not."

AFTER CHRISTMAS.

BY REV. V. M. SIMONS.

As dieth the echo of bugle or horn.

The day after Christmas and Sunday at that, And Jennie and Johnnie were still at their chat : Said Johnnie to Jennie, " Away with regrets, Old Santa Claus, mother says, never forgets ; It seems that he drove to our house in the lane And tried to get in, but he tried all in vain. The chimney was narrow, the flue was too small, He could not get down with his reindeers at all ; So, taking his paper, 'twas long after nine, He wrote in a hurry this nice little line ; I found it this morning, all folded and sleek, And here is the promise of presents-next week ! The letter is signed, so it is not a trick, The letter is signed 'I'm your merry St. Nick.'"

The day after Christmas and Sunday at that, And Jennie and Johnnie had finished their chat, When waking at morning, when fitting for bed. That letter of Nick's they delightedly read ; They scanned every word, and thought with amaze Of trinkets and toys till their heads were nigh crazed ; not how long she sat there alone ; then in a put They tumbled and tossed, and dreamed as they slept Of Nick and his promise, and how 'twould be kept ; - and she fell. The exertion in telling her story Their stockings they hung by the window and door, And not as they hung them a few nights before ; Impatient they waited, till early one morn-The old year was dead and the new year was born,-They opened their eyes to behold such a sight. It filled their dear hearts with ecstatic delight ; Such gifts in profusion, and a letter which said : "Believe it, my children, old Nick is not dead." And Jennie and Johnnie can never forget That letter of promise, and how it was met;

To all of the children they tell of that night, And say to all doubtors-Your chimney was tight.

"I can't be thankful and 1 won't be humble. I'd rather be homeless and friendless, and done with it, than have this horrid half-way life," blurted out the angry girl, half choking with sobs and tears. Just then Harry rushed into the room, calling out, "Mamma, mamma, come quick, papa wants you in the office-a poor old lady-I think she's ying-come quick !" and catching hold of his nother's hand, he led her off before she well knew what he was saying. She found a crowd at the office-door, and soon earned that an old lady had fallen on the pavemen and was badly injured. Some passers by had lifted her and brought her into Dr. Bedlow's office. She

A STORY FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

BY MRS. OLIVE STEWART. What Happened One Christmas-Time.

It was the day before Christmas, and an un ally busy day, even for that busy time.

Among the throng flitting from shop to shop were Mrs. Bedlow and her daughter Louise, a Miss of fourteen. Their purchases were not large, and carefully considered, for the family purse was not a long one. Indeed, the shortness of that purse was such a check upon poor Louise, and her out bursts of "Oh ! that is perfectly lovely," or, "Ma mma, we must have this," became so frequent, so urgent, that her mother was fain to hasten from the brilliant display which so dazzled and tantalized her young daughter. Their backs once turned on the forbidden fruit, Mrs. Bedlow soon succeeded in recalling the wandering thoughts and heart o Louise to home and its concerns; so that by the time they reached their own door, she was gayly chatting and speculating over the little surprises and delights of the morrow. She ran up-stairs with great bounds, like a boy; caught Harry on the landing, whirled him off with her into her own room, shut the door, locked it, and told her brother in a whisper that she had made a lovely wax cross for mamma-papa had given her the money for it. When dinner was over, Louise went up-stairs to dress for an evening engagement. She had prevailed on her mamma to allow her to accept an invitation from May Dunsford for Christmas-eve. The occasion was to be the despoiling of a magnificent Christmas-tree ; and among other objection in Mrs. Bedlow's mind was this : she knew that Louise must contribute for that tree a present to her friend, and she also knew that any present she could afford to give would appear paltry beside its costly surroundings, and so bring humiliation and heart-burning to its donor ; but Louise was importunate, and her mother, foreseeing that the lesson must come sooner or later, gave the sought-for permission, with one condition, she must be ready to return at eleven o'clock.

Mrs. Bedlow waited for her and found her, as she had feared very much excited.

The moment she saw her mother she threw u both hands, exclaiming, "O mamma, mamma ! was splendid, it was gorgeous ; such presents of all sorts, you couldn't imagine ! Oh ! I wish you had seen them."

"My dear," replied her mother with a tender. mournful smile, "I do not wish to see them. I than the whole lot, watch and all. Good-night, my are nearly as bad. pet."

Louise returned the kiss, but not warmly, not and Tom into a tomb. even graciously, and retired.

Next morning with break of day, the two young ones, Harry and Fan, were up, and dashing into the dining-room, they found and bore off two stockings, which in the matter of contents, might have been a squirrel's hoard ; but it was understoed that the regular Christmas gifts would be distributed immediately after breakfast. Louise came down late, and through the morning meal was unusually silent and reserved. Breakfast over, all repaired to the library, and there, amidst the general joy. Miss thawed a little. She found for herself, besides books and some minor gifts, a comfortable cloth

Louise had been deeply affected by this scene. She implored her father to save the poor woman, that she might devote herself to her care. She now broke out into vehement sobs as the recognition of the wickedness and ingratitude of her conduct broke upon her mind. She was allowed many hours that afternoon for reflection, and then her mother talked to her long and earnestly. At the end, Louise formed a firm resolution to give to God obedience, submission to his will, to be contented with her lot, and cheerfully, lovingly to perform such duties as lay in her way.

A Poor AMBASSADOR'S TRICK .- The following is a specimen of the style of witty stratagem by which court favor and royal liberality were often won in much blood was shed. Johnston. the days of Queen Elizabeth (who naturally was rather niggard of her bounty): When Queen Elizabeth first proposed to Defoe, the famous civilian, to employ him on a diplomatic mission to Flanders, she told him, among other things, that he should have twenty shillings a day for his expenses, which, at that time, was thought a liberal allowance. Johnston.

"Then, Your Highness," said the doctor, "I will spend nineteen shillings a day in Your Majesty's service."

"What will you do with the odd shilling ?" said the Queen.

"Oh, I will reserve that for my wife and two children.'

This answer had the fact intended, and a considerable increase was immediately made in his allowance. Notwithstanding this, he was pressed for money during his stay in Flanders, and thought of a novel plan to get a supply ; he sent in a packet to the Secretary of State two letters ; one to the Queen and the other to his wife, which he misdirected, so that the letter to his wife was addressed "To Her Most Excellent Majesty," and that to the Queen inscribed his dear wife. The Queen, having opened the letter, was surprised to find it begining with "Sweetheart," and afterward interlarded with " my dear," " my love," and other affectionate expressions. It concluded with requesting her to be very economical, for he could send her nothing, as he was very short of money, and could not think of trespassing on the St. John.

bounty of Her Majesty any further. Whether the Queen suspected the trick, or believed in his necessities, is not certain, but an immediate supply of money was sent both to the doctor and his family .- Youth's Companion.
