two things :

- ADDRESSES .- The matter of presenting addresses to distinguished personages is greatly overdone. It is well enough, indeed, eminently proper, that a city should, in an address, speak its welcome to such distinguished strangers as the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise ; but that every society, great and small, should present an address there is no necessity. We are not able to say with absolute correctness how many addressca were read to the Vice-Regal party, but the number was very large, and each one was very like every other one. A reply to each was necessary. To prepare the Marquis and his secretary. They did it quite cleverly. Of course the infliction had to be endured patiently and politely, but it must have been a great bore. Reform in the matter of addresses is in order.
