The Protestant missionaries report more converts for 1877 than for any previous year since the recent opening of the Empire. Active steps have been taken toward evangelization by means of native helpers. The conclusion of the rebellion in the South will most probably work to the advantage of missions. All things considered, the government is doing most for Christianity in doing nothing. Any more direct favoritism would bring such a storm of suspicion and priestly indignation about the missionaries as would place them in a less favorable attitude than that which they are now able to take.
