THE SONG OF THE SUMMER.

"These all wait upon Thee."
In the time of the summer joy
Arises from land and sea
A song whose words are all winged with love,
And Lord, it ascends to Thee.
And O, for the host of singers!
On the hills, in the vale they throng,
And they sing till the echoes ring,
For they love their song.
In the hour of the early dawn,
That creeps from the east;
In the time when the fathering companies
Sit at their plentiful feast,
When the noon is great in glory,
Or the evening shades appear,
O, Father, God, from the fragrant sod,
Thy hosts draw near.

They sing that the earth is strong
And rich in its water-springs;
That the valleys blossom, and hills rejoice;
And glad birds sing on wings;
And O, for the hoary mountains,
And the mighty marvellous sea;
For there is no spot by Thee forgot,
All speak of Thee.

The singers are numberless,
For the breezes wake to song
The bees, the flowers, the host of leaves,
And the anthems linger long,
Nothing on earth is silent;
Songs rise early and late,
O, God, to Thee shall the praises be,
For Thy love is great.

This is the song's glad burden—
"Bless thou the Lord, my son,
He causeth the clouds to grow;
His hand is above the waters,
The seas His voice shall know."
And it is His breeze that moves the trees,
His sun that lights the earth,
Oh, bless his name, and his praise proclaim
With joy and mirth.

This is the summer's song,
Father, whose love is free;
And all things living their voices blend,
For they owe all joy to Thee.
But we are Thy favoured children,
Shall we not bless Thee still?
We can but pray, through the long glad day,
Do Thou Thy will.

THOUGHTLESSNESS.

By JOHN E. BULLARD.
O God, how thoughtless have I been,
Forgetful of Thy blessings given,
Unconscious, while time ebbeth on,
How far I've strayed from Thee and home.
O God, how thoughtless have I been,
From infancy to furrowed brow,
To teach me now, that God unseen,
To feel there's none so good as thou.
O God, how thoughtless have I been,
To walk in darkness, dark as night,
When in Thy holy Word is seen
The words which gave me life and light.
O God, how thoughtless have I been,
While each event of life has made
Thy ruling hand, thy goodness seen,
In all that thou hast done and said.
O God, how thoughtless have I been,
To think, that Thou, my Saviour gave,
For such a statement for my sin,
Whom to accept, alone, will save.
Now, O, my God, for mercies given,
As light is shed to guide to heaven—
The house of God, for I believe.

The Fire-side.

OUR CABIN BOY.

"So this is our cabin-boy of whom I have heard so much talk," was my inward exclamation as I walked on deck and perceived a dark-eyed handsome young man leaning against the railing, and gazing with a sad, abstracted air into the foamy waves, which with little fury were lustily dashing against the vessel. His hat pushed back from his forehead gave a good view of his face, which, though full of youthful beauty and vigor, nevertheless bore traces of recent suffering, such as can only be traced to unrequited passion, which changes our whole life with its painful memories, and over shadows our future like a funeral pall.
I heard so many remarks made about him by the crew, who were so averse to coming in contact with him, were continually tormenting him with their rough jokes. Hearing of his sturdy refusal to take anything intoxicating, I followed the impulse of curiosity and attempted to draw him into conversation with me.
"Allen," I asked as he turned and saw me approach him, "have you ever been on the ocean before?"
"No, sir," he replied, respectfully touching his hat.
"You will find that this is a very rough and dangerous life then," I continued.
"I shall endeavor to use myself to it as others have done before me, besides," he continued earnestly, "as long as I feel that God dwells on land and sea, I can safely face any hardships or danger which I may have to encounter."
These words, uttered with such an innocence and trust in a supreme power, surprised me; I felt that though young, his mind was far superior to his surroundings, and I readily perceived the reason of his dislike to the rest of the crew, who were neither refined nor very intelligent. Not being entirely satisfied with my own remarks, I continued:
"Why did you not accept the money which some of the sailors have so good-naturedly offered you?"
"Because," he replied almost violently, "I hate the smell of rum, I despise the beverage, and can only look with disgust upon those who favor it; and," he said, with suppressed emotion, "because I have felt the curse of its baneful effect."
He said no more but abruptly turned and left me. My interest and sympathy were sufficiently roused, however, and I resolved to watch over and protect him as far as possible from the unbecomable influence of the captain, and the rough jokes of the sailors.
A few days after my conversation with Allen I was standing beside the captain in deep conversation, when suddenly, rough shouts and laughter broke upon our ears; we proceeded to the forepart of the deck, and found a group of sailors trying their utmost to persuade Allen to partake of their grog which was regularly doled out to them.
"Laugh on," I heard Allen's firm voice reply, "I'll never take a drop. You ought to be ashamed to drink it yourself, much less offer it to another."
A second shout of laughter greeted this reply, and one of the sailors emboldened by the captain's presence, whom they all knew as a great drinker himself, approached the boy, and with a "Now me, honey, git ready to take right over your own head, when ye've swallowed this," was about to pour the liquor down his throat when, quick as a flash, Allen seized the bottle and flung it far overboard.
While the sailors looked on with surprise at the sinking bottle, Allen looked pale but composed at Captain Harden, whose face was scarlet with suppressed rage. "I trembled for the boy's fate," said Captain Harden's voice broke the momentary silence. "Henceforth, I'll do my best to protect him. I'll teach him better than to waste my property."

I saw his hand tremble a little as he took hold of the rigging, for to one unused to sea-life it is extremely dangerous to climb that height; for a moment he hesitated as he seemed to measure the distance, but he quickly recovered himself and proceeded slowly and carefully. "Faster!" cried the captain as he saw what care he measured his steps, and faster Allen tried to go, but his feet slipped, and for a moment I stood horror-struck, gazing up at the dangling form suspended from the arms in mid-air. A coarse laugh from the captain, a scolding from the sailors, and Allen again caught hold of the rigging, and in an instant more was up in the watch-basket; he waved his hat to me and disappeared.
"Now stay there, you young scamp, and get some spunk out of you," muttered the captain as he withdrew to his cabin.
Knowing the captain's temper I dared not interfere while he was in his present frame of mind. By nightfall however, I proceeded to his cabin and found him seated before the table with a half empty bottle of his favorite champagne before him; I knew he had been drinking freely and therefore had little doubt that his protegee would be released, still I ventured to say, "Pardon my intrusion, Captain Harden, but I am afraid our cabin-boy will be sick if he is compelled to stay up here much longer."
"Sick! ha, not a bit of it; he's much longer," said the captain, "he's got to be much longer in him for such nonsense, no person on board my ship ever gets sick, they know better than to play that game on me. But I'll go and see what he is doing anyhow." Arrived on deck, speaking trumpet in hand, he shouted, "Ho! my lad." "Aye, aye, sir," was the faint but prompt response from above, as Allen's face appeared looking with eager hope for his release.
"How do you like your new berth?" was the captain's mocking question.
"Better than grog or whisky, sir," came the quick reply from Allen.
"If I allow you to descend, will you drink the contents of this glass?" and he held up, as he spoke, a sparkling glass of his favorite wine.
"I have forewarned all intoxicating drinks, sir, and I will not break my pledge even at the risk of my life."
"There, that settles it," said the captain, turning to me; "he's got to stay up there to-night, and I bet my last dollar it he'll be tossed down before morning."

After the captain had disappeared I hastily took some blankets, and induced the steward to supply me with some warm biscuit and coffee, and then proceeded to the poor fellow. He drank it eagerly without saying a word, at last he said:
"I suppose I will have to stay up here all night." "Yes, poor fellow," I said, "but why did you not take at least a little of the wine just to humor him? You would have been free now if you had done so."
"Sir," he began earnestly, "if you had promised your mother to marry her, you would never have tasted anything intoxicating, would you break that promise?"
"No, certainly not, my friend, but I think if your mother knew the circumstances you are placed in at present she would absolve you from your pledge for the sake of your safety."
"She does know it, she does know it," he said, "twice whispered the young grasping man tight by the door, but he was not to be discovered in my work of mercy, I cut the conversation short and bade him good-night."
Once only during the night I heard the watch call for another blanket, and to my inquiries replied that Allen was well but very cold.
By the early dawn Captain Harden ordered him to be taken down, for to his call of "Ho, my lad!" he was no reply, and he began to feel alarmed. A glass of warm wine and biscuit was standing ready for him beside the table, and he was sober now, when he saw the limp form of Allen carried into his presence by two sailors, his voice softened as he said, "Here, my lad, drink that and I will trouble you no more."

With a painful gesture the boy waved him back and in a feeble voice said:
"Captain Harden, will you allow me to tell you a little of my history?"
"Go on but do not think it will change my mind, you have to drink this just to show you how I bend stiff necks on board my ship."
"Two weeks before I came on board this ship I took a handful of turf, and threw it down upon my mother's coffin, I saw the people leave the spot, and heard the dull thud of falling earth as the section filled the grave which held the last remains of my dearest one. Some for me disappeared, and I was alone, yes, alone, for the one who loved and cared for me was gone. I knelt for a moment upon the fresh turf, and while the hot tears rolled down my cheeks, I vowed never to taste the liquor which had broken a mother's heart, and ruined my father's life. Two days later I stretched my hand through prison bars, behind which my father was confined. I told him of mother's death; of my intention to take my mother's coffin, and of my intention to throw it into the sea. Do with me what you will, Captain, let me freeze to death in the main-mast tower, I will not see the sea below, anything but do not let me see my mother's coffin, force me to drink that poison that has ruined a wife's husband, and do not let me ruin a mother's only son."

He sank back exhausted and burst into a fit of tears. The captain stepped forward and laying his hand, which trembled a little, upon the boy's head, said, "For my mother's sake, and for the sake of Allen Bank, let me catch any of it, I'll treat him, then, he has withdrawn to his apartment. The sailors scattered, and I was left alone with Allen, who with a look of surprise and wonder, said:
"Lieutenant, what does this mean? Is it possible that—that—?"
"You are free," I added, "and that no one will trouble you here, for I am a lieutenant, and I have a right among the others that have been here before me; but their tardiness of arrival made it impossible for me to come with you.
