One article of the church covenant says: "We believe that pride has crept into the various churches, and very many poor that worship, from fear of being ridiculed and made uncomfortable; therefore, we believe all who have the cause of God at heart, and especially those professing religion, should always study to dress as plainly as possible, and always study to act from principle, to make every person or child easy and comfortable in any dress whatever that they may

A change has evidently taken place, brought about probably by the pressure brought to bear on the Government by temperance members and others. However it may have been caused we shall be glad if by any means a properly framed Permissive Law is enacted though, of course, we would give the Government more credit had they determined on the right course independently of outside pressure, and without exhibiting too strong a desire to sait the demands of the rum traffic.

It is proper, notwithstanding the seeming assurance of the Premier, to caution the friends of sound temperance legislation against expecting all they have hoped. To avoid disappointment, expect nothing in this matter till you get it.

ST. PATRICK.

March seventeenth is a great day amongst Irish Roman Catholics. It is the anniversary of Ireland's he declares the reference in the Speech to be to a Patron Saint. Who was he? What did he do? It is said that he was born in Scotland early in the fifth century; that he arrived in Ireland about the middle of the century; and that he was greatly zealous and successful in his labours for the conversion of the Pagan Irish. Many miraculous works are ascribed to him, and devout Roman Catholics everywhere regard him with profound reverence. A great number of legends cluster around his name. These are sacredly believed by the children of the church. Everybody has heard that he drove into the Atlantic Ocean all the snakes and other reptiles in Ireland, having first gathered them together on the top of a mountain; but it is unfortunate for the truth of the legend that writers of the earlier history of the country mention the freedom of Hibernia from this class of animal. As a specimen of his power and the manner in which he exercised it, it terest both by the press and pulpit.
