this act of Mary to suggest either practical or ideal Christianity ; but examination may correct this, and awaken a deeper love within us for a holy life.

First, Christianity is determined by motives and purposes. An act which springs from benevolence, to Canada early in August. Lady Tilley returns to and not selfishness, is a holy act. Of course, we St. Andrews. must distinguish between that impulsive love which is instinctive, and that love or benevolence which comes from choice, and is guided by reason. The former lacks moral quality, and, therefore, is by no means benevolence.

based upon a pure motive. Selfishness could not have entered her mind. She expected no material on their way home. remuneration from Christ. She knew her Master was of humble parentage, and that he had none of this world's goods-no house in which to live, nor money to pay His taxes.

Another method by which we may judge motives, is in the way duty is performed. There is a right way which affords no ground for doubt, and there is a way to do an act which is open to questionable motives. He who obeys conscience, and goes to God for wisdom and direction, will be guided aright. Mary did not go to Peter, nor to John, nor to Judas, to know whether it would be policy to take the precious ointment, and pour it on the head of our Lord, but she settled the matter, no doubt, by consulting her conscience and her God ; and in this course there was safety. A pure motive manifests itself forcibly in thus doing. It is a fact that Christians often overlook the motives which actuate them, and many of their religious deeds are open to severe criticism, which is speak of our attachment to Christ and His cause ; our love for missions, and our desire for the conversion of the heathen, etc. "Well," says the religious work, the last paid ?" &c. Now, it is quite evident that Christianity is watched, and that there will continue to be skeptics in the future, no matter how wisely Christians perform duty, or how circumspectly they walk , but is it not true that our acts before men will not always bear investigation. In matters which are secular, we try to use our best judgment; we summon in such cases our highest intelligence, but in religious things it often seems as if we had laid intelligence aside as a thing incompatible with Christianity In wordly considerations, if we seek counsel at all,
