not noticed that the sky in the south yonder was growing very gloomy indeed, and it was not until one big black pioneer cloud hid the face of the sun that he began to fear a coming storm. He hasten. ed to fill his basket to the brim with the finest and ripest berries he could gather. Then the rain began to fall; big, heavy drops pattered on the bramble bushes and the beech-leaves faster and faster, until Charlie was glad to take refuge under a huge spreading beech-tree, beneath whose giant boughs he was almost as dry as if he were in his mother's cottage. By-and-by loud claps of thunder, which he had heard at first rumbling in the distance, came in quick succession, and the lightning flashed and flamed half across the sky. Our little blackberry gatherer was a good deal alarmed at this, but as the rain came down in torrents, he was very thankful for the comfortable shelter of the big beech-tree. " Charlie, Charlie ! Come here.'

Charlie Bonsor started up from the trunk of the beech-tree against which he had been leaning, and looked this way and that to find out who had been calling him. It was a woman's voice, and at first he was half inclined to think it was his mother's. While he was thinking about it, half uncertain what to do, he heard again, still more in earnest.

"Charlie, Charlie ! Come, be quick !" He rushed out of his shelter, plunged through the rain, and made his way to a little hand-gate, for that was where the voice seemed to come from. There was a little cottage close by it, and at the door a pleasant-looking woman was standing.
