LITTLE THINGS.

We call him strong who stands unmoved-Calm as some tempest-beaten rock-When some great trouble hurls its shock; We say of him, his strength is proved; But when the spent storm folds its wings, How bears he then life's little things?

About his brow we twine our wreath Who seeks the battle's thickest smoke, Braves flashing gun and sabre-stroke, And scoffs at danger, laughs at death; We praise him till the whole land rings : But is he brave in little things?

We call him great who does some deed That echo bears from shore to shore-Does that, and then does nothing more; Yet would his work earn richer meed, When brought before the King of kings, Were he but great in little things.

We closely guard our castle gates When great temptations loudly knock, Draw every bolt, clinch every lock, And sternly fold our bars and gates; Yet some small door wide open swings At the sly touch of little things.

I can forgive-'tis worth my while-The treacherous blow, the cruel thrust; Can bless my foe as Christian must, While patience smiles her royal smile; Yet quick resentment fiercely slings Its shots of ire at little things,

And I can tread beneath my feet The hills of passion's heaving sea, When wind-tossed waves rolls stormily; Yet scarce resist the siren sweet That at my heart's door softly sings "Forget, forget life's little things."

But what is life ? Drops make the sea; And petty cares and small events, Small causes and small consequents, Make up the sum for you and me; Then, O for strength to meet the stings That arm the points of little things !

THE BIG BOOTS. The ruins of that old country school-house yet remain, a deformity by the roadside. It had brick walls, and these are not entirely gone. A portion of the chimney, too, is still to be seen ; while the old foundation-stones, and bits of lath, and broken layers of mortar, make the place desolate and forbidding. The wet, spongy farmlot in the rear is no handsomer, nor the rude highway more attractive, than was the case forty years

It would seem as if country school-houses, like country graveyards, were once begrudged the room required for them, and hence pushed into the most uninviting places.

Even now, in sleep, I sometimes dream of m school days there, and of the little boy with the big boots-the sorrowful little boy, whom none of us knew enough to make happy. Boys are not really more cruel than men, but their well of kindness lies deep, and they leap over it and run around it, without knowing how clear and sparkling its waters would be if drawn up.

I was a lad of eleven, the first and only winter of my attendance there. I am now more than fifty and in the review, that single winter seems as long to me as a dozen years. The incidents of youth have a consistency like that of pure gold, and the mind afterwards beats them out, so that they cover a very broad surface.

Mr. Tanner, the master, I would know in a m ment, were he to rise up before me now; and the fresh-looking girl at the desk in the corner, and the blue-eyed country beauty, whose seat was by the window, and the freckled boys, and boys with tow bair-the big boys on the back seat-and the little boys on the front bench by the stove, I would recognize them every one, could some psychologica wonder bring them back to me again, with the looks that they have long since shed, atom by atom.

There was one little fellow about my own age whom, on the first day at school, I remarked as having a thoughtful and somewhat troubled face, and to be poorly dressed.

It was a cold day in November, and at recess. some of the boys put on their overcoats. One of them, who had a very handsome garment of the kind, on taking it down from its nail in the entry, observed beside it an old faded coat belonging to jeering, cruel air and derisive whoop, exclaimed, "What rag is this?"

At the time he threw it across the small entry and out upon the stone step.

Another kicked it as it fell, while a third caught it up and ran with it, as if were a kite or a ban ner. Presently, however, it was dropped; and Mrs. Allen?" asked a merry girl of a silver-haired as the boys became somewhat scattered, I saw the little fellow of the reflective face hastily pick up the despised article and return it to the place where it hung. As he turned away his countenance was flushed, and he drew the back of his hand across his a smile. "But finish your game, and then, perhaps, somewhat handsome eyes.

It was his coat, this was plain; and all my enjoyment of the recess was spoiled; for I thought how he must feel to be jeered at and insulted for what he could not help, and what had no doubt caused him much anxiety and mortification, even before any one had made it a subject of ridicule.

he had worn it in the morning; but when the day was over, and all the children were making ready for exclamations, the eagerness to win, the chagrin of home, as the bitter wind whistled past the door, glad to find that nothing was said, although some of the boys looked curiously at histhread-bare attire, his soul, as the game advanced. as if wondering how he could wear such clothes on the very first day of school. But I now observed that he had ill-fitting boots, much too large for his at cards." feet; and although the coat escaped attack for the time, the boots did not.

"Boots! Boots!" "What is the price of old leather?" "Who wants to take a sail in a mudscow?" were some of the unfeeling ejaculations cards. We're just in the mood to listen, for I have that he was compelled to hear, as he started out been badly beaten, and I don't like to be beaten."

I found him stretched at full length on the damp ground, out of sight of his tormentors; and when I knelt by his side, and put my arm tenderly about him, his sobs were violent. He cried long and child. Not yet forty, my hair was as white as you bitterly-all the more for this sympathy so precious, so unexpected.

Presently a number of school-boy faces peered over the fence that had hidden us from the common view; but after a moment's watching, they slunk away in shame.

I soon perceived that my schoolmates were talkng earnestly among themselves, and saw also that some of the faces I had thought so cruel wore a look of repentance and sorrow.

The teacher's bell sounded, and we all thronged into school-Robert Brown the last. How sad he looked! The master asked no questions; but he must previously have observed something of the condition of things, for when school was over at night, he put his arm around Robert's neck, and asked him to remain for a few moments. Robert held me by the hand, and asked that I might remain also.

Then, when we were alone, he told, at the maser's request, the story of his troubles. How simply and how frankly he spoke, and what unstudied pathos there was in his words! The schoolnaster's eyes were full of tears; and in answering the poor little boy, his voice became choked, and nore than once he left a sentence unfinished. As o myself, I could not help weeping outright. The next day Robert was absent. He had taken old during the few minutes in which he lay on the wet ground, and as the weather was now stormy, his other had not ventured to send him.

His absence afforded the master an opportunity f talking to the other pupils in a way in which he ould hardly have done had the little boy with the ig boots been present.

My schoolfellows had, however, already begun think-begun to put themselves in Robert's lace and imagine how they would feel if their nothers, who so loved them, were poor and careworn, and sat up at night, trying to make old hings answer for their dear boys, hoping that the other boys would not notice the difference, or at least would not speak of it-to consider how it would be if, when they came to school, all this anxiety, and toil, and love were mocked by unfeelng voices, and all the dear things of home were usulted through a senseless derision, by those who had the good fortune to possess parents who could ony them new coats, new mittens, and new boots. There is almost everything in thinking, and at last he boys thought.

Master Tanner spoke kindly to them on the subject. Though he could be stern at times, there was now not one atom of severity in his tones. His heart had no room for anger; but as he spoke became eloquent. It was a soft, winning, kind of eloquence, and the most thoughtless boy in the school was affected to tears.

Whether or not Robert's mother knew what had ranspired I cannot tell; but the succeeding day he came again, wearing the same coat and boots as be fore. But the boys saw them not, or saw them only to feel a heartache, and a new born sympathy for the poor little fellow who would not have worn them if he could have helped it. The tide of im-sensitive hearts within our care, is of the utmost importance. If we would have then learn to speak gently and kindly to all, we must teach by precept and example in their early years, while their minds are so elastic as to be led to pattern after the influence which surrounds them.

I will relate a little incident of my own experience. I was unusually busy one morning preparing for company to dinner. My little son of four years was amusing himself with his playthings about the room. He, too, seemed hard at work, building bridges, block-houses and churches. He was continually coming to me asking questions, and requiring assistance. After a little time I noticed he had left his play, and was back against the wall

I said, "Georgie, dear, what is the matter?" No reply.

When I repeated the question, the answer came between broken sobs, "You don't speak pleasant

"Well," said I, "don't cry; come and tell me

So he came to me; I took him upon my lap and asked him to tell me just what I had said. Years have passed since then and I have forgotten all but the impression it made. A few pleasant words, the tears kissed away, and soon at play again, but I had learned a lesson never to be forgotten.

He is now grown up, and I would no more think of speaking unpleasantly or unkindly to him than I would to company who might be visiting me On the other hand, a rude, selfish, or unkind word never passes his lips. His attentions toward me are always most respectful, kind and loving. If we would gain respect and esteem from our children we must also speak to them in a kind and courteous manner.
