and three stalwart menbers of the capital police force placed on guard at each, with orders to admit none family. Scores of congressmen and senators were either turned away or compelled to wait until their cards could be carried to the house and an order for admission sent back. Newspaper correspondents were furnished with passes, and every facility given for obtaining full and correct accounts of the affair. The streets outside the White House grounds were packed with a mute, tearful crowd, many of whom were clinging to the iron paling staring at the White House with faces full with sympathy and low voices full of tears. There were a large number of ladies in the crowd, and the deep sympathy with the sorely injured President was made plainly manifest by the handkerchiefs which sought brimming eyes, and the dry, gulping sobs with which strong men cleared their throats before venturing to ask a question. Within the White House the scene was, indeed, a sad one. Toward noon the strict rule which had been observed towards callers was relaxed, and many congressmen and intimate friends were admitted and given passes to go and come as they pleased, and the corridors, staircases and offices were filled with an anxious and sad-eyed crowd of distinguished men. In the cabinet room, and in the President's private office sat the members of the Cabinet, who had gathered at the first news of the assassination. In the President's private office Secretary Blaine sat with a sad face, but cool, collected and ready to direct any necessary movement. As he moved around and conversed with his brother cabinet officers, or awaited with anxiety each twenty minute bulletin which the corps of physicians sent out, the strength of character of the man became apparent, and instinctively every person turned to him for advice and suggestion, while the words, "My poor President," that fell from his lips showed that the broad heart felt as if a brother lay at death's door and was wrung with anguish therefor. Up and down the room passed Robt. Lincoln, Secretary of War, anon pausing to relieve the overburthened secretary of meeting some anxious inquiry, again relapsing into thought and gazing down upon the placid Potomac with misty eyes as the memory went back came into the White House, the victim of an assassin's pistol, but cold in death. All work in the executive offices was suspended and the clerks and secretaries wandered through the rooms or sat at their desks grief-stricken. At noon telegrams of inquiry and sympathy began to pour in, and all the afternoon the White House wires were kept busy with three operators at the keys.

A Chicago despatch says of the assassin : Charles J. Guiteau, who shot the President, has been known in Chicago the past twelve years, and for much of the time considered more than half insane. He wore his hair brushed up in front, which gave him a startled look. When he first arrived in Chicago he began practising law. He went to New York, only to return in 1876. He then professed to have been converted, and began lecturing under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. He soon returned to his former practice of deadbeating. About six months ago he disappeared from his usual haunts and has not been seen in Chicago since. Guiteau has a brother in Boston, who gives him

Mrs. Larabee, instead of breaking the news to her mother, sent her to her sister, Mrs. Towbridge a quarter of a mile away where she was detained all day by all sorts of innocent subterfuges.

Early Saturday morning at about the time of the dastardly attempt, Mrs. Garfield complained to her daughter Mrs. Larabee of feeling ill. She added, "I fear something is going to befall James' family." "Mother don't worry," was the soothing reply, "I think the trouble in his family has passed," alluding to the recent illness of the President's wife. "No, never come by themselves, and I have a presentiment that something is wrong with James." The President's mother is so perfectly wrapped up in her son that her daughters state the intelligence of the murder will be her death. Every scrap of news which might lead to arouse her suspicions is carefully kept from her.

A gentleman who saw the shooting gives the following statement of the occurrence : "I was coming down Pennsylvania avenue when I saw a carriage coming up the avenue the horses running so fast that I thought they were running away. Just as damn it." After hearing this remark, I thought Atkinson, died at that Institution last week. there was something wrong and ran after the carriage. CURED OF A Serious Liver Trouble Lower Granville, April 1873. MY DEAR FRIEND :- I have always, until of late, been a bitter enemy to all patent occult preparations in the shape of medicines for the sick. But in consequence of an unlucky fall from the deck of a schooner bound for Boston, I fell down into the cabin, by which, displacing two of the short ribs on the right side, the liver was so seriously injured that for twenty-four hours death was a seriously injured that the seriously i expected every moment. In a few days a bloat was discovered in the ankles, pervading in a short time all the body. I used every medicine that medical art could debody. I used every medicine that medical art could devise, not excepting a thorough course of mercury, in rate of six per cent. per annum, to be paid at the end of order that the liver might be brought once more to perform its proper functions, but did not succeed until I had taken a jug full of your LIFE OF MAN BITTERS which you kindly sent me. After I had taken a few draughts I began to improve. I was always fond of Bitters, when scientifically prepared, and this induced me, although an unbeliever, to partake of liberal draughts in the morning at 11 o'clock, and 4 P. M., of your Bitters, and before I thought, was cheated into a cure so far as I am truly surprised that such a valuable and at the same time safe compound, should not meet with the liberal patronage that it, in my opinion, so justly merits. I am yours respectfully, WILLIAM KENNEDY, M. D. Sold throughout the Maritime Provinces. For sale by dealers generally.
