The frequency of suicide, which has lately been referred to as one of the unpleasant signs of the times, is regarded in Roman Catholic circles as a matural consequence of the spread of Protestautism. An American hishop bases upon the statistics given in Prof. Morselli's work on the subject a theory to the effect that a Protestant is twice or thrice as suicidally inclined as a Roman Catholic. In Prussia, for instance, the suicides per million among Protestants are 187, while among Roman Catholics they are only 69. In Galicia, on the other hand, the proportion is 16 Protestants to 45 Roman Catholics Bavaria and Austria closely resembling that which season in the work of erection.

COMPARISONS ARE ODIOUS. A subscriber writes that he purchased a bottle of Dr. Dow's Sturgeon Oil Liniment and used it and it gave him more relief in a severe case of rheumatism of very long standing than anything he previously had tried. They are such comparisons as these that make comparisons odions to those manufacturers of remedies, so called, where success depends entirely on advertising and puffing. The difference between these remedies and the class so fitly represented by Dr. Dow's Sturgeon Oil Liniment is, that the former gain their sale solely by the advertisements, while to the latter the advertisement is but a letter of introduction, and when the genuinely good article thus becomes known it soon is looked upon as a necessity.
