INSTANCES OF clerical intolerance are not infrequent on the part of the ministers of the Established Church in England. Recently a vicar refused to bury a six months' old infant because it had not been sprinkled, and so wrote the father. The father is a Yorkshire man, and in his interview with the vicar gave him a bit of his mind, and subsequently served him with a notice that he would have a dissenting minister to perform the service. To this notice the vicar raised a technical objection that it was not in conformity with the Act. A fresh notice was served, and the father had another stormy meeting with the vicar, and on leaving him threatened to take other means to enstances he was willing that the Baptist minister should officiate at the grave. He did so, and read the Church of England service at the funeral.
