MY ANGELS. BY EMILY R. PAGE.

More faintly gleams the waning light, Along the western land. And, like a sower comes the Night, With shadows in her hand. O, once the maiden Night was wont To woo me to her arms, And o'er my wounded spirit pour The healing of her charms ;

To lay her pale hand tenderly Upon my pillowed head. And the sweet light of blessed dreams Around my heart to shed ; To hush her breath, and gently hang Sweet silence o'er my rest-Watching me as a mother would The infant on her breast.

But now, she passes slowly by, Nor brings me dreams nor sleep, But only breathes a low, sad sigh, And sometimes seems to weep. But always by her side there come Three phantom forms of air-Two, with soft curling locks of light, And one, with midnight hair.

And each upon her bosom wears A dial of the hours, That fell while yet my way of life Was overgrown with flowers. And so I live them o'er and o'er, And watch them circle on As erst they did, when from my heart The worshipped were not gone.

The calm eyes of the Angel Three Seem charming me from sleep ; I gaze into their beaming depths, And then-I turn and weep. I fain would reach and clasp them elose-Yet down 'twixt them and me, I hear the waning surges toss, In death's unfathomed sea.

And so I look upon the flower That slumbers by my side. To see how like the living is, Unto the three that died. My soul is drowned in agony-In watchful, wakeful prayer ; Sleep stands far off, and drowsily - Binds up her flowing hair.

And Night goes slowly, slowly by, With silence on her lip-Reluctant, from their leash of stars. To let the moments slip. The nights of then, the nights of now. Like light and darkness are ; Those, folded full of golden beams-These, without guiding star.
