A very thick fog prevailed, and suddenly without the least warning, the ship struck the rocks with considerable force. Four of the crew attempted to climb ashore by means of this rope, but before they could succeed the poor fellows were lifted by the heavy swell which was running and dashed to pieces on the rocks beneath. Then a cradle was arranged on the hawser. The first man to be sent in it met the same fate as the previous four. The "Emerald" happened to be lying in Forteau bay, which is about five miles from Point Amour, and in answer to distress signals sent a number of her men to assist at the wreck.
