Messrs. Thompson & Co.

Gentlemen:—After a thorough examination of several organs manufactured by Messrs. Doherty & Co., for which you are the General Agent, I have much pleasure in stating that the result has been most satisfactory. The tone is good and the touch faultless, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are deserving of the high reputation they have already attained.

PRECOCITY OF OUR BOYS.

The very children of to-day seem to be born tired worldlings and the innocence of youth is a thing of the past. There is much to be said in favor of broad education and general reading; but when children are allowed to devour the ephemeral literature of to-day, there is no doubt but that their tastes become vitiated and their morals corrupted. It makes me long for the good old days of my boyhood, when 'Guy Livingston' was forbidden fruit; although that book was morality itself when compared with Onida, Philips and Zola. When I remember how small I felt, when a youth, if I were by chance presented to some celebrated man or woman. I am amazed at the self assurance of Jim Brazen. Brazen is now a junior at college, and writes so-called poetry for the university magazines. He has enough self-confidence and conceit for a dozen full-grown men. I happened to be at Mrs. Hyson's the other day, when this sweet youth, who has only recently left his nurse's lap, was presented to a noted poetess. He patronized her calmly. As he was leaving I overheard him say to Mrs. Hyson: 'I am very glad to have met your friend. In fact, there are few women in the world I cared more to meet. She has her faults; but still, I am glad to know her. Were she faultless I should have been better pleased; but, as it is, I don't regret knowing her.' I should have been glad to have boxed the boy's ears and sent him home to bed! Brazen is a type of a largely increasing class, I am sorry to say. Mrs. 'Bill' Green, Mrs. Hyson and Mrs. Nightingale have encouraged and petted these conceited little apes till they are insufferable. They are flattered into the belief that the mild verses they write prove them to be second Keases or Byrons. Their essays and reviews are praised till those youngsters really believe that they write better than Macaulay or Matthew Arnold ever did. And that reminds me of what pretty, curly-headed little Geraint, who went abroad last year to study men and manners, said of the ever to be lamented Arnold, whom at first he greatly desired to meet. After six months' absence from home he calmly wrote to a kindred soul: 'I have developed to such an extent in the European atmosphere that I have got far ahead of Arnold, and so have decided not to present my letter of introduction to him, for we should have nothing in common. Arnold was well enough to begin with, but he is too crude for my present advanced state.' And Geraint is not yet two-and-twenty! What greater satire on modern education than this extract from his letter can there be?

THE CONTENTED MAN.—At the opening of the Railroad Men's Building, erected in New York by Cornelius Vanderbilt, Hon. Chauncy M. Depew made an address, from which we make the following extract: You may think from what I say that I want in the railway service of the New York Central, the West Shore and the Harlem, the man who is satisfied with his condition. I do not want any contented men around me. In the olden times when people lived in hamlets where there was no steam, no electricity, no railroad communication, and died in sight of the church spire which saw them born, they could be contented; but we don't want any contented men around now, neither do we want sour or disgruntled men who are dissatisfied with their lot, but are not seeking to better it. We want ambitious men, who want to be better mentally and physically and morally to-morrow than they were yesterday, and who by being better mentally, physically and morally next year than they were last, come into the places as they fall in, of those who are higher in position and have greater salaries. A contented man is sure to be a stagnant man, and all of us know stagnant men; they are men to be avoided.

HOME POLITENESS.—A boy who is polite to father and mother is likely to be polite to everybody else. A boy lacking politeness to his parents may have the semblance of courtesy in society, but is never truly polite in spirit, and is in danger, as he becomes familiar, of betraying his real want of courtesy. We are all in danger of living too much for the outside world, for the impression which we make in society, coveting the good opinion of others, and caring too little for the opinion of those who are in a sense a part of ourselves, and who will continue to sustain and be interested in us notwithstanding these defects of deportment and character. We say to every boy and to every girl, cultivate the habit of courtesy and propriety at home—in the kitchen as well as in the parlor, and you will be sure in other places to deport yourself in a becoming and attractive manner. —[Home Guardian.]

GOOD WORDS FOR GIRLS.

Girls are often impatient because they cannot go out into the world and earn money; but a sister or a daughter may be as good as gold herself and render service which no amount of gold could purchase. You have nothing to give to the family treasury in the way of money, but you can give an hour of patient care to your little baby sister. You can give a string and crooked pin to your young brother who wants to play at fishing. You can do something to help Mary, the old cook, or attend to the door while Ellen, the parlor-maid, goes home for a few hours to see her sick mother. You can dress yourself so neatly and look so bright, kind and obliging that you will give your mother a thrill of pleasure whenever she catches sight of your young, pleasant face. You can write a letter to your father when he is absent on business, in which you can put all the news he wants in such a frank and clear way that he will thank his daughter from the bottom of his heart. You can give patient attention to a long tiresome story by your grandmother, though you have heard it many times before. You can laugh and jest at the right time, and, when it is ended, make the old lady happy by a good-night kiss; and, in fact, you can make home a sweet abiding place for all its inmates and yourself a companion who will be sought after by both old and young. —[Binghamton Dispatch.]

A KIND WORD.

A little honest praise brings joy to the home circle. How often a fond and loving wife has said a hasty word of reproof when her wearied, worried husband has returned, late perhaps, from an anxious day's work, to find rest and peace in the scenes of home and the glad smiles of her he loves most, and these words have added to his burdens and darkened his spirit many fold. And the devoted husband, too, unmeaningly, has put a burden on the heart of his loving and trusting wife, by a thoughtless criticism of her dress, or table; a failure to notice some special preparation she has made for his return, or magnifying some trivial omission, or some unsuccessful effort to do, when the failure has already tried her. How much happier would the home be, were each to look for points of kind mention and praise, and notice less apparent or real shortcomings.

SOFT PARTS OF CONVERSATION.

We must respect a few practical rules if the art of polite conversation is to be preserved. When in company, no theme should be discussed upon which there is a difference of opinion, for few can argue and keep their tempers. Interruptions to the flow of discourse should never be made; contradictions are out of the question. No allusion should be made to affairs with which any of the company are not familiar, especially of private affairs known perhaps to the speaker and the immediate person addressed, and mention of which causes the unfamiliar to feel as if left out and put on one side. An equally valuable aid to good manners and success in the saloon is the habit of never praising the virtues, beauties, and fortunes of the absent to any such extent as to seem to imply dispraise of or contempt for those of any of the present. Nor should people discuss their illness in public; it is out of all taste to introduce so dreary and disagreeable a subject. Nothing approaching the character of scandal should be tolerated. This does not hinder the telling of a good story when there is one to tell; but scandal is not only wicked and cruel in itself, but its public telling marks a hopeless vulgarity that is sufficient to exclude the teller from the drawing-room for the future, if it is intended that the place shall be one of nice elegance and gentle manners. While no one should absorb more than a moderate share of the conversation, unless one is of the sort to whom people come especially to listen, yet one should try, on the other hand, never to chill conversation by monosyllables and curt answers; and one should eschew sarcasm as one would profanity or slang. Conversation in its perfection keeps everything bright and sweet and sparkling, and renders its participants reluctant to break up the happy company by a premature good-bye. It is not, perhaps, quite easy of cultivation; yet any one who really tries, may achieve success in this most graceful of social arts.

LADIES TO THE FRONT.—The temperance cause has always been nobly upheld by the weaker sex. Although we say the weaker sex, we really find that in more ways than one they are not the weaker sex. No, they are and always have been the stronger in such good works as temperance. Let them go on. Many a rum-seller has quailed before the prayers of women. The temperance victory in Westmoreland County was largely due to the prayers of women. Let them go on in the good way.

JUST published, a new edition of Dr. Cullverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of Spentorrhea or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion. The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of early error may be radically cured pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain, and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself chiefly, privately and radically. This lecture should be in the hand of every youth and every man in the land. Sent under seal, in a plain envelope, to any address, on receipt of four cents, for two postage stamps.
