THE COURAGE OF HOLINESS.

By R. G. Wilkin.

Sin, whether actual or inbred, is such a foreign quantity to the soul's legitimate makeup, is so utterly out of place in the temple meant only for God, as to cause the individual constant embarrassment.

“Conscience doth make cowards of us all. The thief doth fear each bush to be an officer.” After a man has committed crime, his entire surroundings seem changed. In reality there is no change here at all. The change is in the man. And that inner quaking lends itself to the wretch's exposure.

These facts are equally true with the Christian, conscious of the presence of inbred sin. He knows he is not the kind of man he ought to be, notwithstanding his joys and triumphs and sterling integrity. The grace of pardon only emphasizes the unspeakably dark and damnable nature of that hidden, lurking foe.

“Tis worse than death my God to love,
And not my God alone.”

The unsanctified believer presents the strange anomaly of the holiest and the most defiled, the bravest yet the most cowardly, the heir of heaven yet in danger of hell.

This dual state blunts the keen edge, produces hesitation, and inspires uncertainty and fear. We have known many good Free Methodists who were in mortal dread when attending a district or camp meeting for fear some one would put a test on the congregation. They could sail fairly well in a general love-feast, but their plane would plunge in a perfect love test.

How changed all this, when the Comforter comes to abide with them! What rest! What a sense of inner rectitude. The sign their imagination saw hanging on them, saying, “I am carnal,” is off now. No more quaking under sharp, searching truth. No more fear of holiness tests in the public service. No more discomfort while laboring around the altar with seekers of entire sanctification.

Say brother, did you ever pray with a seeker who struck through so deep as to run your well dry? Embarrassing, isn't it? God bless you, friend, you can strike a vein that no one can sap. Press on, pilgrims, and don't spend another day without that confident courage born of a deep inner crucifixion and cleansing from the body of sin by the power of the Holy Ghost.

Freeport, Illinois.

Thomas Carlyle said: “Time and space are not God; but creations of God: with Him it is universal here; so it is an everlasting now.”
