A LONG AGO INCIDENT

It was nearly a hundred years ago that a boy of eighteen left his country home in Kentucky to travel to the nearest city to look for work. It was his first venture into the great world to search for fame and fortune.

To save expense, he traveled twenty miles on foot to the nearest town on the stage-coach line, carrying his clothes in a carpetbag, and spent the night at the inn, helping the hostler to pay for supper and breakfast.

His fare took the last dollar from his purse, but that fact was not disturbing; and it was with a feeling of exultation that he stowed away his bag and swung himself up to the seat beside the driver in the stage-coach.

The driver had gathered up his reins when a woman, with a shabby bonnet and shawl, rushed up to the coach and implored a seat.

"Can't take you this time, madam," the driver refused civilly. "Every seat is taken. There isn't room to squeeze in a cat."

"But I must go! I must!" begged the woman, tears choking her voice. "I have word that my son is terribly sick, and he's alone in the city, and he'll die! And he's all I have!"

The driver got down and looked inside the coach. He shook his head as he slowly climbed back to his seat. As he had said, there was no room.

The boy could not bear the tragic despair of the woman's worn face. With a bound he was on the ground beside her, rescued his bag, and thrusting his ticket into her toil-roughened fingers, helped her to his seat. Not a word was said; the driver cracked his long whip; the coach rolled away in a cloud of dust, leaving the boy standing alone in the road.

He was turning away, bag in hand, whistling to keep up his courage, when a man who had witnessed the little transaction from the walk stepped up and accosted him. He soon learned the facts in the case, and, after studying the boy's face thoughtfully, said:

"Young man, how would you like to study law?"

"Like it? Of course I'd like it," declared the boy, for that was one of his dreams for the future.

"Then you come into my office," decided the man. "I think we'll suit each other."

That was the beginning. The boy recognized his opportunity when it came and made the most of it. Later in life he became a successful lawyer in that city to which he did not travel as a boy; served two terms in the United States Senate; and was elected governor of his state.

Now I don't mean to say that every boy whose actions are ruled by compassion and kindness will meet with the prompt appreciation and help that came to this country boy; but courtesy and kindness are great factors in a successful life, and often pay larger dividends than we know.—Mrs. Agnes Barden Dustin, in Kind Words.
