ODD STORY ABOUT THE KAISER

The London correspondent of a Chicago paper says:—It is rather curious to outsiders to know that the German Emperor regards himself as the rightful successor to England's throne. This is a matter rarely spoken of, though perfectly well realized at court, and it is a strenuous reason against the Queen ever abdicating in favor of the Prince of Wales. The German Emperor bases his claim on the not unnatural assumption that as his mother, born Princess Royal and eldest child of Queen Victoria, is heir to that mother's crown, he is her immediate successor. It is said that the Kaiser is wildly indignant because his mother will not press her claim and take her rightful place as the future sovereign of England. That the Prince of Wales is not the Prince of Wales, but that the Kaiser is that as well as Emperor of Germany, he has fully decided in his own mind. When the time comes for his contention it is scarcely probable that he will hold his peace. Of course, it is not for a moment to be supposed that England will take Wilhelm for its King. But the case is one upon which even the constitutional lawyers cannot agree. While the Queen remains sovereign this family unpleasantness is not likely to arise, but when she abdicates or dies something interesting may occur.

Why are we so glad to talk and take our turns to grapple, when so rarely we get back to the stronghold of our silence with an unwounded conscience?—Thomas a' Kempis.

SUNDAY MORNING

I cannot go to church today,
Let Parson say just what he may.
Why, if I get my stockings wet,
I'd catch an awful cold, you bet!
If I should traipse all through the snow,
The Lord knows what I say is true—
The cold would turn me black and blue.
And you know, George, my strength is small—
I could not stand the walk and all.
To go on foot six blocks today
Would mean a shocking price to pay
In broken health and doctor's bills:
And look! The drifts are like great hills.
Yet! though it hurt to stay away,
I cannot go to church today.

MONDAY MORNING

'Tis snowing still! I do declare!
But, hook or crook, I must be there!
Club meets today with Nancy Brine
Who lives on Raspberry Twenty-nine
Right on the other side of town.
(If I'm not there on time she'll frown).
For walking, I'll wear extra hose
And those long snow boots hubby chose;
Then I shall be so snug and warm
I cannot possibly take harm.
Nan always serves a dandy lunch,
And somehow, I've got quite a hunch
From something that I heard her say,
That she'll outdo herself today.
So in spite of snow, I do declare,
By hook or crook, I will be there.

REASONS WHY THE OLD MAN MUST DIE

seems to take time and often great suffering to get carnality and all its brood rounded up and on the altar for faith in the heart, and fire from heaven to co-operate for its destruction.

While others are satisfied with religious campaigns, please join us in a desperate fight for a Romans 6:6 revival in the holiness movement all around the world.

All for Jesus,
