GORDON'S CLOAK SHOP

THE NEW CAR'S FIRST 500 MILES

The treatment the new car receives during its first 500 miles will go a long way toward determining the service it will give later and whether its repair bills will be heavy or merely nominal. Even the most carefully finished surfaces do not have the highly polished finish that they will have after a few hundred miles' use under proper conditions. The new surfaces necessarily produce more friction than they will later, and care must be taken that too hard usage at first does not produce enough heat to damage bearings, cylinders or other moving parts.

The following suggestions will be found helpful:

1. Do not exceed 25 miles per hour for the first 500 miles. A higher speed even for a minute or two may start a cylinder or bearing to scoring.

2. Higher speeds for the second 500 miles should be applied carefully and for only a few minutes at a time.

3. Use too much rather than too little oil for all parts. Change the cylinder oil after the first 200 miles, then 400 miles, and every 500 miles after that.

4. A pint of light cylinder oil poured into every five gallons of gasoline for the first 500 miles will help a great deal in lubricating cylinder walls, pistons and rings.

5. All engine and chassis parts should be lubricated oftener than called for in the lubricating directions.

6. Notice the fan belt. It may stretched a little after the first 250 miles and fail to give sufficient fan blast. Have it tightened and it may not need changing again for a long time, although it is well to test it frequently.

7. The new car will use more water than after being run. Notice the water level in the radiator each time it is taken out.

8. Notice the wheel bearings to see that they have plenty of grease and that they turn freely without being loose.

9. Watch the brakes carefully. Feel them occasionally after a run to see if they are heating.

10. Follow operating directions strictly in regard to care of the finish and upholstery. Many cars have the finish spoiled by over-attention as well as by neglect.

The appeal made by Premier Sir Richard Squires against the fine of $1,000 imposed by the Lower Court for failure to make proper Income Tax Returns was dismissed by the Supreme Court at St. John's, Newfoundland.
