MEDICINES, DYES, FLAVORING EXTRACTS AND PERFUMES COMES FROM COAL

Science tells us that all the great coal beds were formed during the same period in that remote day called the carboniferous age. Some of this coal became anthracite, the hard, brittle coal. Larger coal beds did not attain this hardness, although they approximated it. Coal in these beds is known as bituminous, or soft coal. Most of the anthracite coal of the world is confined in a space of small area in Pennsylvania. There is another section in Wales where an especially high grade anthracite is found, and there are some other portions of the earth's surface where anthracite seams have been opened.

In the United States the soft coal fields are very extensive. Large fingers of them are found in Pennsylvania, where they virtually sweep over the state of West Virginia, and in many other states soft coal is found. It is the fuel used by more than fifty per cent. of the people of that country. For many years soft coal has been the favorite fuel for producing power. One reason it has not been a favorite among those who use anthracite is because of its black smoke and gaseous odor, although from the standpoint of its virtue as a fuel, the heat it produces is much more intense and it is a much more economical buy as its cost per ton is considerably under anthracite. There are qualities of bituminous coal that are not smoke producing to a degree that is at all offensive, but these are the exception. Soft coal has other attributes aside from those of a fuel. When man discovered coal he found that it would burn and for many years that was all he knew about it. In comparatively recent times, through the miracles of modern science, there has been resurrected from these relics of the life of the boniferous age much of the coal was laid down. In our flights of imagination let us gaze into the crystal of that ancient day. All around us is heavy and luxuriant vegetation in which are found gorgeous flowers of every hue, herbs and plant life of which healing medicines may be made, pervading a deep, heavy fragrance exuded by all flowering things. All this and more is compressed in the most onery lump of bituminous coal, and in fact, in all coal. But a process has been found in which all these attributes can be released from soft coal. The first step is to change it to coke. Coke is a by-product fuel, excellent for use for heating the home as well as for commercial purposes. It produces a steady, intensive heat without smoke. From coke four by-products come. These are: gas, tar, benzol and ammonia. One of our most important fertilizers is made from the bases and the ammonia, and is called ammonia sulphate. From the tar thousands of compounds are made which are used in every-day life. From the benzol liquids are made which have the same functions as gasoline and kerosene, and even high explosives. In our perfumes and dyes modern civilization has captured the fragrance and colors of the flowers of remote antiquity, and when we take our aspirin, or eat our vanilla ice cream we are taking much of the healing balms that originated gases before man, or are tasting a flavor that has been released to delight us from a prison confinement of thousands and thousands of years. There are many medicines and many flavoring extracts that are made as by-products of bituminous coal, so pause for a moment when shovelling these black evil-looking lumps of coal on the fire and consider what a contribution to civilization is contained in the stored energy of ages confined in this ordinary fuel, commonplace though it is in our present day life.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

From Cuba over 3,000 foreigners have, in a comparatively short time, been deported as undesirable aliens. In addition Fernando Sirgo, a professor in the University of Havana, has been dismissed by presidential decree on the charge of propagating "Red" doctrine and sowing discord among students against members of the faculty. In Panama, too, foreign agitators have been warned by the Government that they will face summary deportation as "pernicious undesirable aliens" if they participate in Labor or other social movements. If all those who have been deported from different countries could be gathered together there would be enough of them to form a little Bolshevik Republic of
