"REVENUE, NOT TROUBLE"

Church and State in England, have arisen in a practically united protest against the proposal of Winston Churchill that a five per cent tax be placed on racetrack betting. Mr. Churchill, eager to meet the needs of the country, did not anticipate the storm that was to break on the introduction of the idea. He is reported as saying that he was not looking for trouble, but for revenue. His own estimation is that during the next fiscal year, the book makers and their friends will yield a revenue of some six millions of pounds sterling, but the bookmakers are of the opinion that the effect of the tax will be to decrease the direct revenue of the bookies and to drive them out of the business in favor of illegal street betting. Racing men do not hesitate to say that it will put an end to racing which reaches in England the dignity of national sport; breeders are strongly of the opinion that it will ultimately result in the degeneration of English thoroughbred breeding; the Bishop of London and other church leaders are objecting to the tax, inasmuch as they point out it amounts to a Government recognition of the legality of betting.

The Labor men point out that the ultimate end of racing is in sight, and that with the decline of breeding, from five to ten thousand people will be thrown out of employment. The farmers, it is concluded, also would suffer, as the decrease in the demand for the fine British oats, on which race horses are fed, would follow decline of racing.

Many women are opposed to the tax because with some of them of their sympathies with labor; others, because of the unemployment; it, apparently, will bring about; also agree with the assertion of a bookmaker that within a comparatively short time the betting tax will have as demoralizing an effect upon the sporting community as that produced by prohibition in America. Delegations are being arranged for conventions called, and demonstrations prepared, all to bring to Mr. Churchill a realization of the mistake he has made. Mr. Churchill does not agree in this, nor does he think that he has created a situation that will in the long run—and, according to many, it will not be a very long run either—diminish both the size of the golden egg, and will finally kill the goose that lays it. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, quite undisturbed by the tempest he has raised, is already making arrangements for the collection of the tax.
