RADIO WILL PIERCE JUNGLE.

Radio, faithful comrade of the explorer, undaunted to heights or depths, ice or heat, will follow the Stirling expedition into the unknown jungles and mountains of Dutch New Guinea. The party has sailed from San Francisco for the roundabout voyage that will terminate on the shores of Papua, where the real journey will begin.

The half dozen scientific adventurers, taking the airplane in which they hope to fly over vast uncharted stretches, have arranged to establish three radio stations. The first will be on the coast, at their base camp; the second at an advance camp which they expect to make at a point in the interior, and the third aboard the plane.

The expedition will be augmented at Singapore with an escort provided by the Dutch Government. It is planned for the coast and interior camps to keep in touch by wireless, and when the plane goes on jaunts for reconnaissance, it will talk to the camps and possibly to the outside world.

Matthew W. Stirling, anthropologist, heading the expedition, hopes to speak direct from the plane to Singapore, Manila or some other outside station that may inform the world how the explorers are faring and what they have found. The plane is fitted for photography and aerial map-making. It carries all the latest safety devices.

By using the plane to hop from the coast to the interior, the party will eliminate much of the hardships that attended previous expeditions. Yet there will be greater hazards than the air ordinarily involves. The men will be sailing over a country of which they know nothing.

Mr. Stirling hopes to study the strange pygmy race reported to dwell in the mountains of the interior. These pygmies have been seen by other expeditions, but never at close enough range for detailed examination. They are described as shy people, dwelling in trees and so primitive as to be little above animals.

Other objects of the expedition are: To reach the great precipice of the Rassa Range—said to be eighty miles long—with an absolutely vertical height of 10,000 feet. To land on Lake Habbema for the first time, and to explore the neighboring territory. To study the ethnology of the coast and Mountain Papuans.

To obtain a representative ethnological collection from the different tribes visited for the United States

National Museum. New Guinea is the largest island in the world except Australia. For centuries it has resisted the efforts of explorers. Today it is one of the least known portions of the world.

WIFE'S RECIPE FOR MARITAL HAPPINESS

Let us admit that Mr. and Mrs. Edward Stewart of Kansas City, knew something about life, remarks Grove Paterson in the Toledo Blade. Mr. Stewart is 92 years old and Mrs. Stewart is 85. They have been married almost 66 years. Mrs. Stewart gives a sound recipe for a happy married life. It is short and easy to remember. She says: Keep busy.

She also lets out a bit of a secret. She says she has sometimes, in these 66 years in which she has been keeping busy found herself in disagreement with her husband. Her method has been to forget it—and then bring it up at another time when her husband was feeling differently. Then she got her way.

The house is a castle which the King cannot enter. Who falls for love of God, shall rise a star.
