

My Wanderings Abroad

by
PROF. ROBT. PUGH

Instructor of Modern Languages at U.N.B.

In writing of this, I find it hard to select any one particular place, episode or person to enlarge on, the more so since my space is limited. I could, in a thousand words, no doubt prove to my own and my readers' satisfaction, that the Empress of Britain, on which I sailed for Southampton, is not all she is thought to be as a sea-boat; that there is no show in the world quite like the Trooping of the Colour in London, or the Aldershot Tattoo; that no one should pass the west of England by, without a call in at Glastonbury and the many Cheddar caves close by; that no Cathedral music in the world can equal, let alone surpass, that of the English Cathedrals, particularly Salisbury, which is incidentally somewhat like Fredericton, and where, this summer, Sir Walter Alcock steered a huge choir through Mendelssohn's Hymn Of Praise; again I might write a book on the Fourth World Jamboree, lately held at Godollo.....in Hungary, by the way.....where I was leader of the Canadians; but I must spare you details of this, having already inflicted them on the Gleaner, and intending, furthermore, to reinflict same, and others, on audiences during the coming winter. The sentences grow in length, and I have not yet started to tell you anything definite, tangible or even interesting. It is so hard to review recent events "in the light of history", more so than ever, when oneself has been the chief actor in them. So let me give you a few random impressions of each of the several countries I passed through last summer.

I saw every country at its best, insofar as perfect weather and pleasant people and surroundings could so make it. Beginning with England, I thought that things were looking up a bit, particularly in London, where there seemed to be a more optimistic atmosphere than when I was last there in 1931. Trade is bettering itself slowly, the railways are netting better returns, thanks to the very sensible plan of pool trains and tickets, of which I shall have more to say in an other connection presently. In London, I saw fewer loafers, meaning that more men are at work there now than were two years ago; but in the country towns, I saw still many unemployed, particularly around municipal buildings, where they seem to await the work that will not come. I did not, however, hear any complain, nor did they otherwise obtrude themselves upon the public.

English roads are uniformly A1, particularly when one has mastered the left-hand driving. I marvelled at the number of midget cars, which can run with ease for several years, on forty miles to the gallon. While I was over, a trophy race was run for touring cars, around the streets and backyards of Douglas, in the Isle of Man; the greatest thrill staged for many years, they say; but I was not there.

My wanderings in England were confined to the south-west and south. I had gone over with some intention of studying at first-hand, English Cathedral music and some local history; and I was fortunate to go to Wells, Canterbury, Salisbury, St. Alban's, Gloucester, Winchester, and of course, St. Paul's and Westminster Abby. I was rewarded by discovering some old instruments at Gloucester, and in other places, one of these having originally been given to Salisbury Cathedral by King George III; but their details, too technical, will be set forth elsewhere. I eventually left the Old Country, richer for having been on holy ground, at Glastonbury, and the other places I have mentioned.
