Forestall Addresses UNB Group

New Brunswick's chief probation officer, Frank Forestall, addressed the UNB Human Rights Organization on campus Tuesday night.

Forestall discussed probation as well as delving into the prospective role of the university in the community, encouraging "more educational opportunity in the form of correspondence courses, seminars, and evening classes for the general public.

He suggested that many of these facilities could be offered to members of police forces who would "benefit greatly from such forms of education."

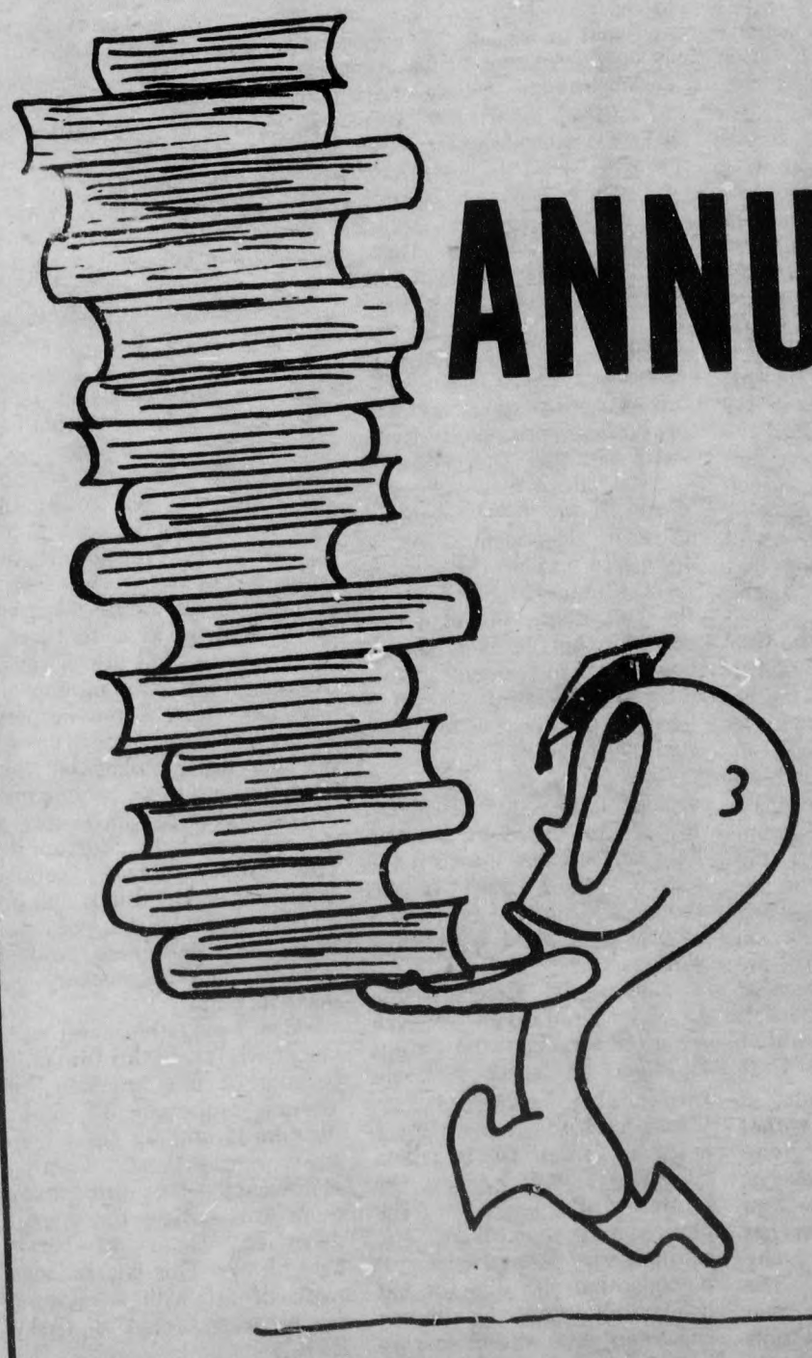

Mr. Forestall mentioned that North Eastern University, in Boston, which conducted such a program, received a great deal of static from their local SDS. The group stated their intentions "to close down this school of justice because they were teaching the pigs."

The association between students and police in classes would lead to a better understanding on both parts, he added.

As well as his talk, Mr. Forestall presented two films, one of which explained graphically the role of the probation officer in relation to the courts. The other depicted the archaic prison systems in some sections of the United States.

Other aspects of human rights discussed were the legal privileges of accused and convicted persons and the charter of the United Nations.
