

Workers march--without student support

By DAVE SIMMS

A spokesperson for the Fredericton and District Labour Council said the leadership of the University of New Brunswick students' union is "weak, lacking in organization and negative."

Provincial labour federation vice-president Phil Booker made the comment during a press conference after the labour council's meeting Tuesday to prepare for yesterday's Day of Protest.

As The Brunswickan went to press early Thursday, activities had begun for the country-wide demonstration called by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in opposition to the federal government's wage and price controls.

Booker held UNB's student leaders responsible for the students' lack of support for the workers' protest. He said students in other parts of Canada represent one of the most militant segments of society and drew attention to the number of Université de Moncton students who expressed support for the Day of Protest.

"Students in Moncton are as militant as students at UNB are weak," said another council spokesperson. The speaker also said he had approached student president Jim Smith to attend a planning meeting and that Smith had refused.

had enough of protests marches." When asked why no student had attended the meeting,

Booker said student and labor unions should work together since many of their grievances with the federal program are similar. He said students need changes in student aid legislation to compensate for rising costs of education and that sometimes students are being hit with rising costs while their parents are not.

Jim Smith made a rebuttal to Booker's comments when contacted by telephone by The Brunswickan and informed of the labor official's comments.

Smith said the lack of participation was not a sign of weakness but an indication that students are "much more realistic in their approach to solving problems. He said Booker was wrong to say that students are among the most militant in Canadian society because labor would have met with the same lack of response and support from Mount Allison University or Acadia University.

Smith said student leaders have been more concerned with problems within student government. He said the leadership has been working as hard as they can to make sure that this effort is made without the support of labor.

Smith declined to say whether he was in favor of the protest because he didn't have enough information to make such a judgement. He said he opposed the idea of a federal government introducing a restraint program after campaigning in opposition to the same proposal when it was put forward by the Conservative party.

Booker also criticized radio station CFNB for airing a new item that local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) which represents 7,000 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local union.

Smith said the local union participated in the protest and that this is what he came to expect from Jack Ranney, the station's manager and his boys.

A member of the news staff at CFNB, Jack Calder, said Booker's charges were "partly true" when contacted by The Brunswickan.

Calder said that he received a phone call from a spokesperson for the division of the CUPE local which represents highway workers. The spokesperson said they would not be supporting the protest and the reason was the story in that effect.

Calder said CUPE had a long history of strikes. He said that local 1390 had participated in the protest. When the phone call came, a correction said Calder was decided to drop the whole issue before we became involved in a matter of internal union affairs.

Calder said he had been back-wards for a while. He said Calder had been CFNB. He said coverage was not a matter of internal union affairs.

Calder said that by the count there were at least 400 people in the protest and that the focus was on the workers' picket lines. He said that organizers had a "cross-section picketing" and that these included the St. John's High School, all the city's local maintenance workers, Fredericton City Hall and all city employees. He said the workers from several unions had
