Workshops for staff and coaches would address the tolerance of homophobic language in athletics.

"Language is very important," says Jude Tate, coordinator, LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, queer) resources and programs and a member of the task force, "in a dance class, the instructor will say 'when the male is leading.'" Using gender-neutral language, she explains, "you would change that to 'the partner who is leading.'"

But something so simple could be the biggest obstacle to the report's success. Homophobic language is very entrenched, and goes well beyond sport.

"There is stuff like calling someone a fag," says Eddie Moss, a member of the men's varsity lacrosse team, "but I wouldn't say it's because we're a sports team. I'd say it's because we're a bunch of dudes hanging out."

What Tate is quick to point out, however, is that being on a men's team does not necessarily make one a "dude." "There's this belief that there are no gays on our teams and no lesbians," she says, "which is an absolute farce...the experience of people who are 'out' is that they are experiencing a social distancing as a result."

Aside from opening discussion, raising awareness, and censoring language, the report also calls for changes to FPEH facilities and advertising. Co-ed locker rooms and gender-neutral restroom facilities are suggested. So is a re-evaluation of poster and website imagery. For example, the posters and ads for dance classes held at the AC picture only opposite sex couples. "You don't have to put 'queer is welcome' [on the posters]," says Tate, "you can just put a rainbow triangle."

The report is still being reviewed by the equity issues committee, as well as the appropriate academic and co-curricular committees. So far, there is no guarantee that the report's recommendations will be implemented, and there is no price tag fixed to the list.

Nevertheless, optimism for the report's success remains high. "We're not talking about billions of dollars," says Kidd, "we're talking about refocusing an already existing system." Tate agrees. "I do think education and awareness can happen," she says, "the cost there is time away from work...and it also takes the voice from the students."
