

Canada & The World

THE DAIRY CREAMER

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 2003

A3

Briefly WORLD

CNN ditches real news

Tom Clancy plots to take precedence, robots and tigers to be added

BY RORY BOREALIS
The Dairy Creamer

Care Bears foe joins Hussein

BAGHDAD - Beastly, the charming three foot tall hamster-like creature who plotted to rid the world of caring in the 1980s with then-dictator No Heart, has joined forces with Iraqi president Saddam Hussein.

Hussein recognized that Beastly's past efforts to conquer good have been foiled in embarrassingly similar manners as those of the Wile E. Coyote and Sylvester the Cat, but it didn't faze the Iraqi president one bit.

"I'm only interested in his complete loyalty. Whether or not he succeeds isn't really an issue here. Also, every evil-doer and leader needs an animated sidekick!"

When questioned by media, Beastly replied: "Shhhkakakakaakaka!"

Hippies set off patchouli bomb

VANCOUVER - A pro-war rally in Vancouver yesterday faced a major setback when a hippy crashed a patchouli packed Volkswagon van into the stairs of City Hall.

Chaos ensued as thousands of conservatives faced off with a slew of hippies who hippie-shuffled their way in after the van carrying vegetarian food and ponchos to cover those who had passed out from the smell.

"It was awful. I was standing there yelling, 'Bomb the fuckers,' and all of a sudden it starts to smell like a Dave Matthews concert," said Jim Groves, a pro-war activist.

Dave Matthews was unavailable for comment at press time.

"It was nothing out of the ordinary. Then they hit us, but they didn't actually 'hit' us, because they're hippies," continued Groves.

Pro-war rally leader Jerry Martin said that the stunt will not force him to call off future rallies. "The hippies got to know that we're not going to stop no matter how bad they make us smell, or how poorly they dance. But, when they got a bunch of people high, we lost large numbers to the 7-11 down the street."

Local man will continue to wear shorts in snow

FREDERICTON - Local resident, David Silver, has made an announcement that he plans on wearing his shorts and sandals despite Mother Nature's decision to dump some more snow in Fredericton this week.

Silver's friends say that he is usually very accurate in his predictions on when to put on the shorts and put away the pants. "Yeah, I always listen to Dave. I took the snow tires off my car yesterday, and now this, but hey, everyone makes mistakes," said his roommate, Mark Chippson.

Silver's mother Pamela is a little less sure in David's ability to predict the start of summer.

"David's always been a stubborn child. When he was eleven he was positive that he was sixteen, so he kept stealing the car. When we finally showed him his birth certificate he was devastated. It took him a long time to regain his confidence, and now look what happens."

CNN, North America's leading news network, has made a shocking decision to discontinue reporting on real news in favor of made up broadcasts with stories resembling Tom Clancy plots.

"The thing is, this war isn't all it was hyped up to be," said CNN senior staffer, Paul Kline.

Apparently, CNN executives are upset about the amount of drama and action in the war.

"I mean, how am I, let alone the rest of the population, supposed to make sense of anything going on? The Euphrates River? We want tigers and robots, things this war has failed to provide," continued Kline.

CNN's new war footage is to be about a group of marines who have to wade through Iraqi jungles and swamps while battling robots, tigers, Cobra snakes, and clones of S a d d a m Hussein.

DEPP
Scissor hands

contempt.

As of now, CNN is refusing to release the outcome of the scripted war, but did mention that all war footage will be directed by renowned Hollywood multi-tasker, Kevin Costner.

"We were going for the whole, Waterworld look - that was outrageous," said Ryan Stevens, a CNN news writer.

"If we can get Iraq to look anything like that movie, I'll say we've succeeded," continued Stevens, who then proceeded to pull out his autographed 8x10 of Dawson Creek star, Katie Holmes, and cry.

"She's just beautiful," said a clearly devastated and lonely Stevens.

It's still not clear whether or not viewers will be able to tell the difference between the "real" war, and CNN's planned battles. However, if all goes well, and Johnny Depp accepts lead role as "The Lonely Southerner who doesn't want to go to war, but will anyway and get really angry and then confused before falling in love with an Iraqi woman thus ending the war," it shouldn't matter.

"We need more guys like Johnny Depp in this war," added an overzealous CNN employee.

"You see his hands? He's got goddamn scissors for fingers; he's going to fuck shit up."

One CNN spokesperson said that viewers should look forward to their new programming, because "on TV, America always wins."

Once the war is over, CNN plans on showing "lost" footage of the War of 1812, which will prove that America won.

Bush mistaken for broccoli

BY ENRON VALDEZ
The Dairy Creamer

This past week, George W. Bush, the 43rd presidential puppet of the United States of America, was wrongly mistaken for a stick of broccoli in a popular Washington, D.C. multiplex theatre.

In a press conference, White House officials released a statement declaring, "that [Bush] was indeed human. That any similarities between the President and the vegetable in discussion were grossly unsubstantiated."

National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice continued by placing broccoli on the list of Axis of Evil foods.

"Broccoli is a proponent of propaganda in the hands of the amoral Al-Qaeda. Let them eat corn," explained Dice.

The incident stemmed from a family night out for some booze and a movie. After pounding back a few dozen beer, the Bush family went to the local theatre to enjoy the Agent Cody Banks. President Bush said the movie made him feel like a "big man."

At the start of the movie, the man seated in front of the Bush party, later identified as Michael Mort, began to complain over the stink of broccoli in the theatre. He turned on the president screaming, "You stink. Your foreign policy stinks. You're a stinking piece of broccoli."

Bush retaliated by bombing Greenland. When questioned about the attack, Bush mumbled something about, "stubbing his toe on September the 33rd."

Dozens of protestors filled the streets in one small Idaho town chanting pro-broccoli slogans such as, "I like broccoli. Imagine salad trays without it!" and "Bush eats broccoli, so he supports terrorism."

Mort never thought his actions would result in such dastardly deeds.

"Bush's foreign policy stinks like broccoli. He's as smart as a week old piece of broccoli. He tries to take over the whole refrigerator like broccoli. One day the vegetable crisper, the next day the cheese tray. And the end result is always gas. I just called it the way I see it. Homey!" said Mort.

Scientists admit they have no clue what is going on

BY HARRY SCOTT
The Dairy Creamer

While many people are more than happy to embrace the world of science and are held in awe by its many achievements, Jason Beaker, chief research scientist at the National Research Centre, claims that most scientists don't know much at all.

"To be perfectly honest, most of the time we have no real idea what the hell is going on. Not a clue," stated Beaker, looking morally superior.

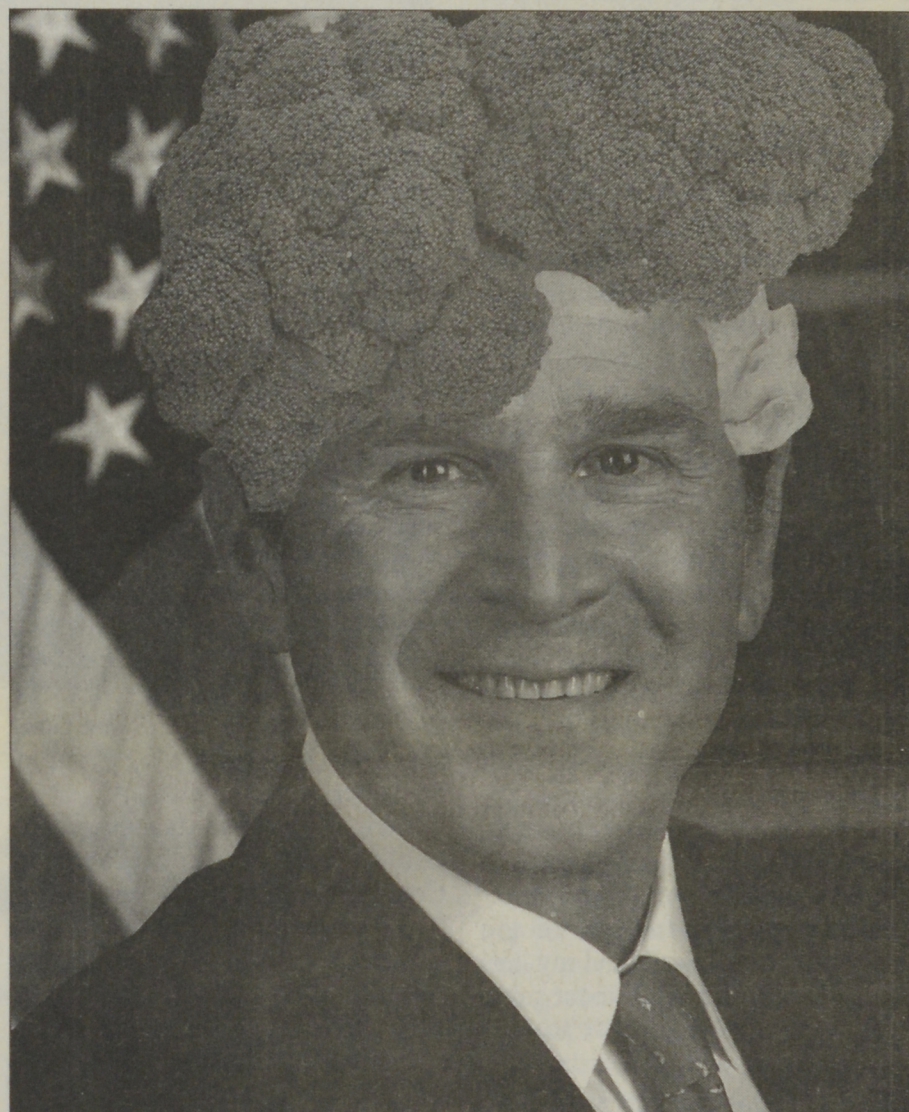

He also said that most so-called scientists end up doing it because they never really understood Shakespeare and weren't sure what else to do. Yet their career path puts them into a position where they are expected to be able to talk with authority about complex matters that the majority of the population will never understand.

"Initially I thought it was going to be really cool playing in the lab with chemicals and seeing what colour they turned when I mixed them together," complained Beaker, "But it turns out that trying to work out what is actually happening is really, really difficult. And nobody else I worked with could help me either because they don't know either. We're all equally ignorant."

Beaker concedes that there have been a few occasions where supposed scientists have managed to make some remarkable discoveries, but he attributes that to pure luck.

"Penicillin is a wonderful thing, but we discovered it on a mouldy old piece of bread that someone left out in their lab by mistake. Just how lucky can you get?"

- A DAIRY CREAMER GRAPHIC ILLUSTRATION

NO BRAINER: Claims of a broccoli head are, at the moment, substantiated.

President blames rap

BY CHRIS WILSON-PHILLIPS
The Dairy Creamer

In a startling statement made on the White House playground yesterday, United States President George W. Bush blamed Outkast's hit song "Bombs Over Baghdad" for his attack on Iraq.

"Once again, the need for state censorship of explicit and inappropriate music has been demonstrated in no uncertain terms," said the President.

"I told you when that Columbine thing happened that we had to get rid of that Manson feller and anyone else who swears and stuff. But we didn't. And now look what happened. Innocent people are dying, because no one had the sense to say to me: 'Hey Georgy, might not be such a good idea to listen to that.'"

Bush said he blames the songs "break-neck beats and astoundingly fast lyrics for his recent actions on the world stage.

The president admitted he had no idea what the song was about, but did say its chorus "got stuck in his head," and took control of his brain.

"It's just so damn catchy," he said.

"I succumbed to the devil music the same way any teenager is liable to start smoking drugs and killing people because of what's playing in their walkmans," he lamented.

Bush also blamed one-hit-wonder boy band B44 for "putting some serious strain on my marriage."

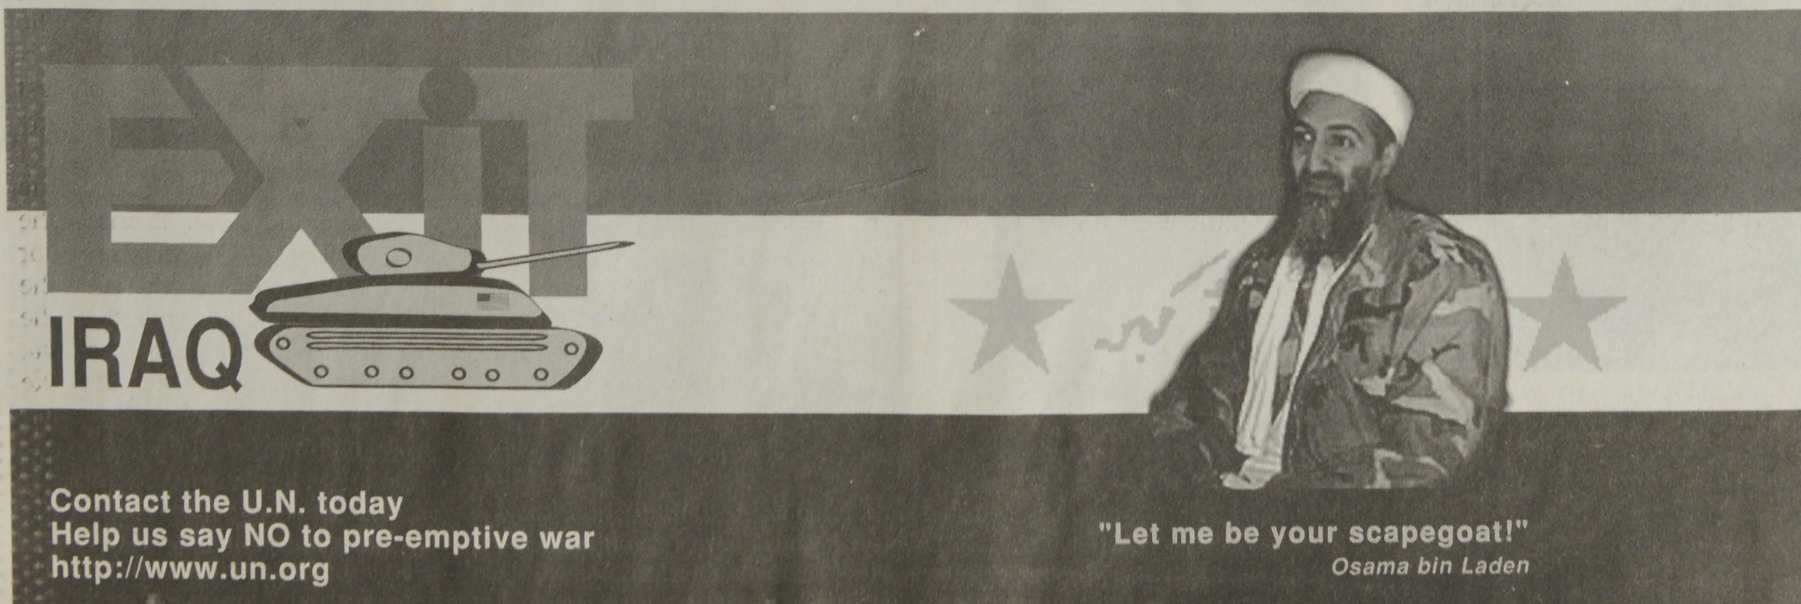

"I suppose singing 'I will get down on you' wasn't something my Chief of Staff wanted to hear. But it's not my fault. It's the song's."

Bush said he can "deal with a knee to the face any day," but when bands like Outkast make him bomb people, it's another story entirely.

"For most of the song, I have no frigging idea what their sayin'. I mean, them rappers just talk so fast-like. But when that chorus comes up, I hear the message clear as a bell."

"Must kill Baghdad. Must kill Baghdad. Must kill Baghdad."

"Ha ha ha you look funny, mister," he continued.

Contact the U.N. today
Help us say NO to pre-emptive war
<http://www.un.org>

Cosy HQ. Perfect for puppet government. Surrounded by rich oil fields. Cost: Humanity