Never too early to start thinking about upcoming baseball season

Fantasy Baseball 2004

Todd Spencer

It's at this point in Fantasy Hockey that most eyes turn to the next sport, a more promising sport and a chance to start over after a disastrous hockey season. Baseball season is just a little over a month away, and the pools are beginning to fill up.

My goal is to help you out, and give a little insight on the upcoming fantasy season, position by position. I don't expect to be universally agreed with, but hopefully I can provide you with another option to look at while making your picks.

Today we look at the men behind the mask, the catchers. Talent wise, this position, after the first few picks, takes a huge drop off, but there are still some decent names available in the pool. If you want one of the top five, you'll need to draft them by round five or six, but why waste an early pick on a catcher when there is a top pitcher still available. There are still some other options out there, so let's discuss the top ten.

1. Ivan Rodriguez, Detroit Tigers

Many expect a drop-off from Pudge's production playing for the Tigers, but I see him turning the young ball club around. Some of his injuries are still stuffed in the back of my mind, but he should be able to top his .297 batting average from last season. He's definitely the top pick, and I know you'd love to have him on your squad over any of the others.

2. Jorge Posada, New York Yankees

Consistency is the key for Posada in New York. With a beefed up lineup around him (Gary Sheffield, Alex Rodriguez), he has the potential to bring up his numbers with all the protection. He's hit at least 20 homeruns in the last four seasons, and there seems to be nothing stopping him from doing it again.

3. Mike Lieberthal, Philadelphia Phillies

The man is in his prime and last year's performance was no fluke. He's capable of more of the same this season, and I expect to see a little more power this time around. He's one of my favourites, and his .313 average last season puts him at number three on my list.

4. Javy Lopez, Baltimore Orioles

Possible one year wonder? I don't think so, but I do expect a slight drop off in his numbers from last season. One reason is because it's tough to repeat a breakout year; the second is because he's in the American League East now, at the plate against the likes of Mike Mussina, Pedro Martinez, and Roy Halladay. He still will be a great asset to your fantasy team.

5. Mike Piazza, New York Mets

I know you are thinking "Finally!" but I think he is overrated as a secure fantasy pick. My concern is his groin injury, difficult for catchers to recover from, and his ability to rebound after missing three months last season. If he stays behind the plate, I don't expect big numbers. If the Mets move him to the field, he could be the top man this year

6. Jason Kendall, Pittsburgh Pirates

He batted .325 last season, but don't expect the average to last this season. His other statistics, however, could take a leap forward though, as he continues to improve and come into his prime as a ball player. He's steady in the National League, and should look just fine in your lineup.

7. Jason Varitek, Boston Red Sox

After a rough 2002 campaign, he bounced back with a career year last season for the Red Sox. He is still a reliable fantasy pick, but I do expect a slight drop in his numbers. But who knows on a team in the A.L. East.

8. Paul LoDuca, Los Angeles Dodgers

After a second half letdown in 2003, I expect LoDuca to rebound back into the elite catcher category in 2004. You may want to put other catchers in this spot, but when you think about it, LoDuca would look so much better. Expect him to be available in the later rounds too.

9. A.J. Pierzynski, San Francisco Giants

He has a new team in San Francisco, but his power numbers will drop. A career .301 hitter, expect other numbers to remain steady, and he should have a few more hits and runs. You can't go wrong with a .301 career batting average at catcher.

10.Ramon Hernandez, San Diego

This was almost a dead heat with Benito Santiago, but I give the edge to Hernandez because of the new look to the upstart Padres. He showed tons of power last season, making the All Star team. He'll be great in your lineup.

A couple of sleepers...

Joey Mauer, Minnesota Twins

Although Matt LeCroy will pick up most of the starts, Mauer is expected to be the designated hitter for the Twins. He qualifies at catcher in most leagues, however, and could be a valuable pick in the last few rounds if you regrettably didn't draft a catcher yet.

Johnny Estrada, Atlanta Braves

He's got big shoes to fill with Javy Lopez gone, but he should do all right for the always consistent Braves. He has amazing potential, and is only 28. In the prime!

So there you go. I hope I helped influence your choice at catcher this season. Next week, we'll continue around the diamond and take a look at first base.

Please send any questions or comments to u4u1n@unb.ca I'd be happy to hear from you!
