

Sexual Assault Crisis Centre

Dear Editor,

I began volunteering with the Fredericton Sexual Assault Crisis Center (FSACC) in March. Like many new university graduates I was looking for a way to use my skills to effect positive change. I signed up to take the volunteer crisis intervention training. I had imagined that training would be a few sessions of mundane teaching and that my volunteer hours would consist of me sitting by a phone in a sterile room waiting for a call. I could not have been more wrong. My training group was made up of women of all ages and backgrounds. The training facilitators were also volunteers and the training process was a series of activities and open discussions. When on call I carry a FSACC pager or my cell phone and I go about my daily routine.

As a volunteer the crisis line is not the only way in which I can participate. We do everything from organizing workshops to movie nights. Volunteering with FSACC has truly been a rewarding experience. If you or someone you know might be interested in training, our next session starts October 4th. We will be having an open house Sept. 18th @ 7:00pm. For information contact us at 454-0460.

Measured response

Dear Editor,

In response to your papers article "Get off the Hill (please)" by Josh O'Kane it seems that a point was missed in the response by Jordan Graham. In my opinion the issue of late night/early morning parties, fires in the street, being good neighbors have little to do with the amount of money the university business brings to the community. That is probably the furthest thing from a sleepy (read irritable) mind of a neighbor at 330 in the morning. Perhaps that neighbor is trying to believe that the noise will soon end and that the flickering lights on the wall of their bedroom isn't their house burning down, but just another couch burning on the street.

Maybe the stakeholders in this situation; the university, the students/party goers, the liquor companies and the homeowners/families should get together and discuss possible solutions. No it wouldn't work, that would be three against one.

The real new year

by Rachel Molnar
The Carillon (University of Regina)

REGINA (CUP) -- For students, January has nothing on September.

Shiny new binders, fresh notebooks, pens in a multitude of colours, textbooks unmarked, school bags untarnished — everything about back to school just screams, "Fresh Start!" Time for a whole new you in a brand new year.

My apartment can't escape my feelings of unbounded excitement every autumn. Forget spring-cleaning: my floors have been scrubbed, blinds dusted, wardrobe sorted and months worth of cardboard, cans and bottles recycled. When it comes time to head back to the classroom, it helps to know the fridge has been sanitized and the garbage cans washed.

This will be the year I go to all my classes. My notes will be clear, concise and accurate and I'll ask meaningful and insightful questions. I'll do the research necessary for my papers well in advance of the deadline and write my essays in due time.

And not only will I do all the assigned reading, I'll devour the suggested and supplementary texts too.

Caffeine won't be my crutch to get me through day — water will do just fine.

My grades will sky rocket and I'll make the Dean's List. My parents will be proud and life will be nearly perfect.

But this won't be the first year I've made these goals.

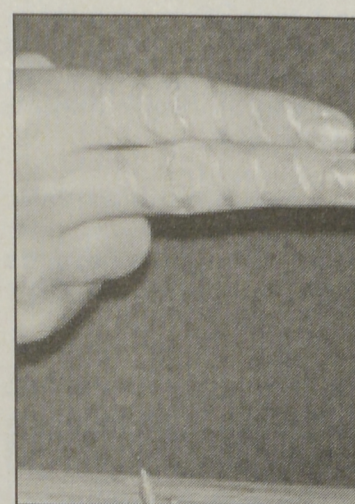

The problem with the high of the new school year is its eventual come down. After four solid years of university, I know exactly when the low is about to hit. With this amount of foresight you'd think I'd be able to do something about it - to prevent my life from falling to shambles, but that sort of control eludes me.

So here it is, the moment to look out for, the one with the potential to shatter your September resolutions, and leave you crying. The mother of all come-downs attacks in week nine. It's the week that bridges the end of October and the beginning of November — when it's too late in the semester to drop classes or get a refund, but still too soon to give up and start an early holiday. It's also the time of semester when beds stay unmade well into the Christmas break and it's a daily battle to maintain even the most basic levels of personal hygiene.

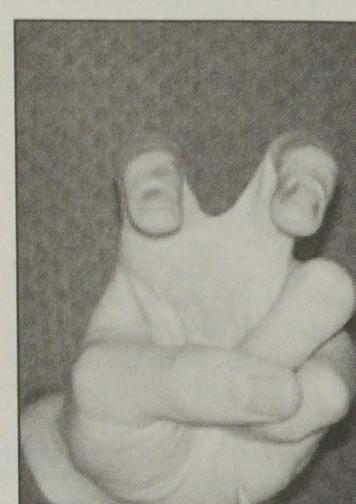

So make your September resolutions now, but do what you can to prevent week nine collapse, and maybe you'll master an art I can only aspire to. But hey, if you see me around in November frantically writing, cramming and generally stressing out, I'll take my caffeine in Rockstar form.
