A letter to the editor on why there should be a huge ass tree in the SUB Atrium.

An artist's rendition of a huge ass tree in the SUB Atrium

Dear Editor:
The advantages of having a large tree (like tree-of-life-large) as a permenant fixture in the SUB atrium clearly outweigh the disadvantages. One may argue that such a tree is useless, inappropriate, or outlandish, but pray thee listen to what I have to say.

Such a tree would enable students to become one with their inner nature, thus embracing the task at hand and increasing productivity. Everyone knows how much time they squander at the SUB while attempting to get work done, but what few of us realize is how a giant tree could help.

While basking in its almighty glory, students would be asking larger questions, ponder more about life, and come to solutions and answers more readily. The tree would stimulate the minds of our youth much more efficiently than any of the fake plastic trees that the SUB Staff guard so dearly.

Also, on the topic of SUB Staff, the giant tree would actually give them something to care for - to love, to cherish and to protect. Although, I don't think anyone would forsee any problems between the students and the tree, as the relationship would be one of loving companionship.

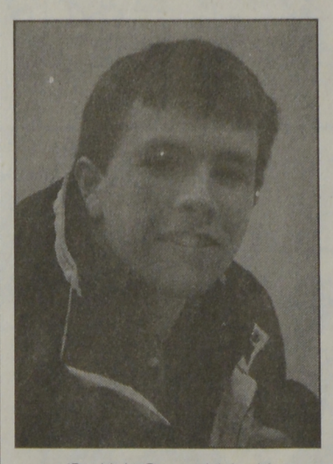

A large tree would also inhibit students from leering across the divide of the upper levels of the atrium at other students, increasing productivity with the beautiful blinders provided by mother nature. Students will feel more in tune with their personal space, as they will not constantly be peering into others', because the tree will block the way with its massive expanse of branches and bountiful leaves.

A cost estimate would most certainly be unnecessary, as the price of beauty and productivity is clearly a non-issue. Just dig up the ground, plant the fucking thing and be on with it. It's time for change, it's time for a tree.

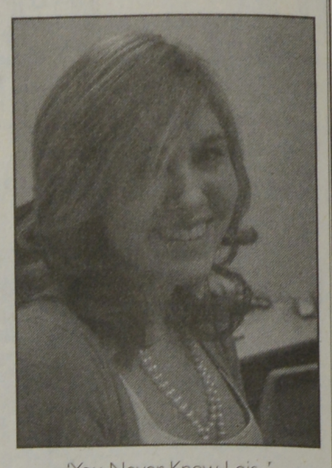

Sincerely,
Bryan Cameron
