Third. Whether the bricks found there corresponded in all essential particulars with those of Havre or other parts of France, at the period of De Mont's enterprise, or whether they satisfactorily appeared to be ancient European bricks.

Fourth. What signs or traces were discovered of the dwelling houses and other works erected besides the fort, and also what marks appeared of the known continued habitation of the place by the French, after the seat of government was removed.

Fifth. What was found to be the elevation of any part of the Island, on the side towards the sea, to entitle it to recognition as the "hill on which a battery was erected."

Sixth. On what particular facts was it de termined that the island "commanded the en trance of the river," and that it was " strong by nature and easy of defence."

Seventh. What particular acts of government or jurisdiction on record, prior to 1750, tended to corroborate the local position so particularly assigned to the St. Croix by Champlain, and especially what particular acts of his own nation prove that his countrymen regarded his location of that River to be the real one.
