HOW BEST TO DEVELOP A CHILD'S CHARACTER

Fredericton Lady Contributes an Interesting Article to the Montreal Star on An Important Subject.

The Montreal Star is offering a prize for the best essay on "How Best to Develop a Child's Character." Among the essays received and published by The Star is the following from Fredericton:

To consider myself a model mother would be useless, for I know that in many ways I have failed to come up to my ideal of what a mother should be to her children, but conditions, and circumstances must be considered and sometimes motherly devotion has to be sacrificed to the duties of a household, the necessary supervision of servants, social responsibilities, church work, which we, as mothers, dare not ignore.

Then there is the thought for the comfort of the husband and father, who, no matter how devoted, is proverbially blind to the thousand and one little duties that are demanded of our modern mothers. In regard to my experience in trying to train my little ones in the way they should go, I am not offering my experience for a guide to others, but simply as a perfectly truthful account of my own experience in training my children.

When my baby, who is now a girl of twelve years, was born, I thought like a great many other mothers, that life needed nothing more for complete happiness. Everything was given up for baby, who ruled the house, and I neglected my husband, I neglected my friends, I neglected myself, forgot to make the many little tempting dishes to tempt the appetite of a busy man, or always to be on hand when some extra supervision was necessary to keep the wheels running smoothly in the household, but not for long, fortunately, common sense and safeguard coming to light with returned health and strength.

I tried lying the babe down on her back where there was always some bright object in view to attract the little eyes, did not dress her up for family relatives to admire, had her out in the air as much as possible, made up my mind that one day's work must be done in one day, gave up certain social evenings, while baby was young, and soon the tired feeling wore away. Unselfishness from my husband, patience with little things from both sides, won the day and our home was once more peaceful. When number two arrived two years later a harder time followed. Sleepless nights made the days seem dark and like a problem. But soon the children were old enough to understand rule and order, and then it was my training began. They got the name of being good children. I have been frequently told that I know nothing of what other mothers have to put up with, why, because I have taught them that home is the best place and have ever tried to make it so.

We gave them the brightest room in the house, let them invite their playmates on occasionally, but never tried to make them play with each other. Kept them clean and plainly dressed, early tea and early to bed, and did not allow them the run of the house.

We gave them plenty to eat, but plain food and sometimes extras for Sunday. Candy on Saturday was eagerly sought for and a cent to spend when the natural inherited craving to "shop" grasped their little minds.

Now they are older they still have a cent to spend and that one cent is as much to them as twenty cents is to more indulged kiddies.

They still love a party but I do not allow them to go to very many and never during school days.

They still go early to bed, bathe as frequently as possible and dress very lightly. They are getting on well at school, and are happy and contented, very seldom ill and have escaped many of the usual childish diseases. I know they love their home. They consider it a privilege to go out or be with mother and I try to share all their secrets but never force their confidence.

I try to teach them to ask God to help them overcome their various faults, such as untidiness, to ask help with their lessons, but do not believe in making a drudgery out of religion, but show them how impossible it is to live without daily prayer to God for every little thing.

I try to make them understand now the necessity of keeping near the "spirit of love," putting each other first; they seldom quarrel, always obey, without being punished in any way, but through gentleness.

I believe the constant "don't" used by so many women is simply useless and I do not think that constant watchfulness is necessary until a child is at least seven years old, for children are curious and need to exercise their brains and when they upset our best china ornaments or break our most cherished treasures, instead of venting our wrath on their diminished heads, let us try to ask ourselves why was I not watching him? Or when the boy whose restless feet carry him beyond the given point where was the child's nurse or what was nothing doing not to see.

I believe in letting my children do as they like as much as possible, then when I have to admonish them my word has some effect. Never strike a child, there are many better ways of punishment if necessary and after all the child is simply a small specimen of his parents, bringing out their faults and failings to the public eye.
