SPOTS ON THE SUN CAUSE TORNADOES

Sun Spots Bring Changes of Temperatures Which Often Mean Storms on the Earth

Investigations at the Santa Clara University, California have proven to the satisfaction of weather experts that sun spots are responsible for great storms on this globe. They cause changes of temperature which affect the earth's atmosphere where it is most sensitive—at the equator and the poles. This, in turn, starts a whirl of air that develops in speed—and you have a great storm.

A sun spot has instant effect on two currents of air or whirls in the air, one from the north pole going south and one from the equator going north. The storm is the battle between these two currents when they meet. That battle may take place so high in the air that there is little or no effect felt on the surface of the earth. Or they may meet on a battle plain near to us and a violent storm—generally of tornado tendencies—ensues.

There are two general storm paths in the world—one north and the other south of the equator. The northern path starts at the equator and moves northward so long as it remains south of the 30th parallel. Once across this line it turns and travels northeast until it spends itself or reaches the polar regions. The same condition holds good with the southern path, except that the original direction is southeast and the change is to the southwest.

Sunspots having started air whirls from both ends of the path, the tendency of the southern whirl, being warmer, is to rise and of the northern whirl to say close to the surface. If the northern current is thick enough as it usually is in the winter time, the effect of the southern current will be lost. Anything that will send the southern current higher into the air will shield the country directly in front of it from the violence of the change of atmosphere it causes. Thus a mountain range will sometimes shoot the disturbing element so high that while a severe storm will take place on one side of the mountains, the other side is not affected at all.

A long stretch of flat country, however, will permit this southern current to settle down, if it happens to be very heavy, and so get closer to the earth. This explains the tornadoes and blizzards which occur in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

The great lakes serve as a deflector of the currents in this country because of the excess of moisture in the air over these great bodies of water and the consequent heaviness of the atmosphere at these points. For that reason the storms on the lakes are greater and more frequent in winter than in summer because the northern current, which freezes and removes this moisture, has the easier time. The southern current being warmer and lighter naturally passes over the lakes at a high altitude, although, of course, it sometimes creates big disturbances.

There are exceptions to these conditions, of course. These are caused by purely local disturbances of the atmosphere which must be reckoned with to produce certain effects—which might change entirely the character of the effect of the battle of the upper air currents for supremacy, causing a severe storm or no storm at all.
