Would Put Love Bond To a Practical Test

There are not to my knowledge any available statistics from which one can say with certainty whether married bliss depends on the husband's occupation in life. The subject came up for discussion in a company composed of about a dozen men and women and while one or two maintained that a husband's calling had nothing to do with the success of marriage, the general opinion appeared to be that it was a factor of very great importance writes "A Bachelor" in the continental edition of the London Mail.

One woman went so far as to draw up an order of merit, as follows: Navy men, doctors with good practices, commercial travelers, explorers (a small class). At the very bottom of the list she placed university professors, actors, clergymen and men of no occupation.

The woman's own husband was a person of independent means who spent most of his time at home and it appeared that her criterion of a husband's quality was the length of time he was deprived of his wife's society.

Assuming that all married couples start with the same advantage, it is perhaps broadly true that the husband's absences and homecomings tend to prolong and intensify domestic love.

As a fearful but wise young woman once observed, "it is terrible to contemplate pouring out tea for the same face every morning for 40 years." Viewed in cold blood, it is certainly a prospect not devoid of monotony and even terror for both parties.

Yet the happiest couple I ever knew was a clergyman and his wife, who had brought up a family of nine and during 30 years of marriage were never absent from each other for more than 48 consecutive hours.

Lightkeepers make good husbands. I have known a dozen of them, every one happy in his marriage. They spend six weeks on a rock and weather permitting, a fortnight ashore with their families. These fortnights are like recurring honeymoons.

Farmers, on the other hand, who are never far from home, make easy and comfortable husbands, even where marriage was not preceded by courtship or even acquaintance.

Frequently in the British islands, a young farmer's marriage is arranged over his head by parents or "match-makers." It is a union of property
